Now, gentlemen of the House, what are the conditions of these Philippine people at this time, that we should go to work and propose to promote a gentleman from the rank of captain to that of brigadier-general? Gentlemen, if you will examine the evidence you will find that the purpose and object of this bill as submitted by the Committee on Insular Affairs is to promote one Captain Allen to a brigadier-general. It is evident that he must have a considerable amount of political influence behind him, as he has already represented this country in Berlin and Russia, I believe. Now, it seems that the Commission are especially attached to this one captain. It seems that the general commanding the Philippine Islands suggested to this Commission six officers whom he thought were particularly fitted to take charge of this force—colonels, majors, captains—but they chose this captain. Now they propose to make this captain a brigadier-general and make the people of those islands pay the difference in his pay as captain and that of brigadier-general.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I want to ask special attention to the reading of the report of the Secretary of War as to the condition of these Philippine people; and yet you want this House to tax them further in order to increase the pay of some particular officer.

The Clerk read as follows:

I shall not now undertake, nor is it the proper office of such a report as this, to argue the economic questions which may be raised by the consideration of these recommendations. The views upon which they are based have been presented in my former reports and in the reports of the Philippine Commission. The reason for presenting them now is that the ills which have recently befallen the people of the islands call urgently for active and immediate measures of relief. The people of a country just emerging from nearly six years of devastating warfare, during which productive industry was interrupted, vast amounts of property were destroyed, the bonds of social order were broken, habits of peaceful industry were lost, and at the close of which a great residuum of disorderly men were left leading a life of brigandage and robbery, had a sufficiently difficult task before them to restore order and prosperity. In addition to this, however, the people of the Philippine Islands have within the past year been visited by great misfortunes.

The rinderpest has destroyed about 90 per cent of all their carabaos, leaving them without draft animals to till their land and aid in the ordinary work of farm and village life. Carabaos have increased in price from $20 to $200 Mexican. The Eastern disease known as "surra" has killed and is killing the native and American horses, further crippling transportation. The rice crop has been reduced to 25 per cent of the ordinary crop. Last year in the Visayan Islands and this year in Luzon a plague of locusts has come upon the land, destroying much of the remaining 25 per cent of the rice crop. A drought in China and the fall in the price of silver have raised the price of rice from $4 to $7 a picul. The Commission has been obliged to go out of the islands and use insular funds to buy over 40,000,000 pounds of rice to save the people from perishing by famine. Cholera has raged and is raging throughout the islands.

The ignorance of the people and their unwillingness to submit to sanitary regulations have made it almost impossible to check the ravages of the disease, which, it is estimated, will claim not less than 100,000 victims. The decline in the price of silver has carried Mexican dollars down from a ratio of 2 to 1 in gold to a ratio of over 2½ to 1, and this has borne heavily on the commercial interests and on the wage-earners.

The insular government has in ten months lost over $1,000,000 gold by the decline in silver, because it was operating on a silver basis, and this has changed the surplus of revenues into a deficit at the very time when the other causes mentioned have caused an extraordinary demand for the use of the revenues for the relief of the people. Agriculture is prostrated. Commerce is hampered and discouraged. All the political parties in the Philippines urgently demand a change of the present currency standard. Some relief would be afforded by opening a profitable market in the United States to the products of the islands.

Mr. MADDOX. Now, Mr. Chairman, it will be observed from that report that every ill that can afflict a country is now upon these Philippine people. That report accompanied the bill that was brought before this House by the Committee on Ways and Means and offered as a reason for reducing the tariff, as you all remember. This Commission that is in charge of the Philippine Islands to-day, which represents our Government, have gone out now, and are spending thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars for rice to feed the people upon—money taken from the Philippine treasury. It seems, further, from the report that there is a disease known as the rinderpest that has destroyed 90 per cent of their work cattle, the caribaos; another disease, called "surra," that is killing the native and American horses; that they only have 25 per cent of a rice crop, and that they are afflicted with a visitation of locusts that are eating up that 25 per cent of a crop. Not only that, but they have cholera, and it is estimated that 100,000 of these people will die of that disease.

Now, in addition to that, a message was sent to the House by the President of the United States yesterday asking us to appropriate $3,000,000 in order that we may give support to these plague-stricken people of the Philippine Islands, and yet the majority of the Committee on Insular Affairs, of which I am a member, propose to tax these people, these plague-stricken people, these people asking alms at the hands of the United States Government, these people who are starving and dying from diseases, these people whose cattle are dying from diseases, and who have lost nearly all of them—we propose to elevate and increase the salary of a captain and make him a general over the police force down there, and do it out of the Philippine revenues.

I say, gentlemen, it is not right. It is an outrage upon these people. But in the first place, it is not necessary. It is wholly unnecessary. There other men in this country besides Captain Allen. We have got 14 brigadier-generals in the line, 21 generals in the United States Army; and if it is necessary to have a general to command down there, why not detail one and send him down there? But the chairman of this committee says that the evidence before the committee shows that when a man comes to be brigadier-general in this country he is probably too old and worn-out for this service. You can see from the evidence that this man whom they propose to promote is 45 years old. We all know that General Funston is not that old. This is the very job for him.

My judgment is that he would make an elegant chief of police, and if it was necessary to have a detective around there he could perform that job all right. [Laughter.] He is young now and he can do it. But we have other brigadier-generals that are well qualified for the job. Any of them can perform that service. The question is, is it humane, is it just, is it right, to inflict an additional tax on their treasury, already empty, to make a brigadier-general out of a captain, when we have, figuratively speaking, got them to burn in this country and nothing to do? Then take the assistants, who are volunteer officers who have no commission in the Regular Army, making them colonels now and taxing these poor people down there to pay the difference between their salaries as a lieutenant and a colonel. Now, gentlemen may say that this is a small matter. Well, it would be a small matter if these people were able to pay their debts and able to live; but we have got abundant evidence before us from the Secretary of War, and, in fact, from every direction, that they are not able to support themselves. They are afflicted with every ill known to man, and not able to live. Now we propose to add an additional tax, levy it upon these poor people, in order to make a general out of a captain and to put a few more additional stars on some fellow's collar.

I say there is no necessity for this. If it is important that we should have a man down there with the rank of a general, we have generals to place there. Send one down from here. If they need a colonel, the woods here are full of them. We can send these officers from here at no additional expense to either this Government or the Filipinos. I stand upon the high ground that it is wrong to inflict this tax upon those people, and if it is necessary—and it may be—we ought to have an officer above the rank of captain to give him the proper dignity, and in all probability to prevent a conflict of authority between the officers of the native troops and the constabulary. If it is true that we need him, we have plenty to send there without promoting this man and adding this additional burden on the insular government down there. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How much time has the gentleman from Georgia occupied, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Fourteen minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think the other side better occupy some more of their time.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is anything in the conditions prevailing in the Philippine Islands to warrant the passage of such legislation as is proposed in this bill. It seems to me that from every point of view this would be bad legislation. I understood the distinguished gentleman, the chairman of the committee, to read from the testimony of one of the witnesses who appeared before the Insular Committee to the effect that the brigadier-generals of the Army were mostly elderly men, and that therefore their assignment to perform the duties pertaining to the position of chief of constabulary in the Philippine Islands is not desirable; in other words, Mr. Chairman, that the ages and infirmities of the brigadier-generals would prevent their performing the active duties pertaining to the position of the chief of the constabulary in the Philippine Islands.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a fact that there are to-day 14 brigadier-generals in the United States Army, and it is also a fact that about one-half of them are of about the same age as Captain Allen, who is to-day occupying this responsible position and who, if this bill passes, we all know will become a brigadier-general. As has been said by my colleague from Georgia, General Funston is doubtless a younger man than Captain Allen. General Grant is a comparatively young man, and General Bell is a young man, and General Wood is probably a younger man than Captain Allen. Therefore I can not see the force of the reasoning of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

But, Mr. Chairman, the law enacted by the Philippine Commission provides for the appointment of only four assistant chiefs. Now, there are in the Philippine Islands 6,000 constabulary and 5,000 native scouts who may be at any moment assigned to duty with the constabulary, making a force of 11,000 men who may be under the command of the chief of the constabulary. There are, as I have said, only four assistant chiefs to-day, but immediately upon the passage of this bill, if it is passed, I predict that it will occur, if it has not already occurred, to the Philippine Commission that four assistants are not a sufficient number for the command of so large a force as 11,000 men. The number of commissioned officers in a force of that size in the Regular Army is something like 450 or 500.

If the Philippine Commission shall determine after the passage of this bill that four assistants are not sufficient to command so large a body of troops, and that in their opinion a great many more were required, they could so amend the law enacted by themselves that it would permit of the detail of 500 second lieutenants as assistant chiefs, thus promoting them to the rank of colonel, and increasing their pay from $1,400 a year to from $3,500 to $4,500, this difference in pay to be drawn from the Philippine treasury at the very moment that the Secretary of War is asking Congress to appropriate $3,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States to avert the destruction by starvation of thousands of Filipinos who have not the means to purchase food to preserve their miserable lives.

But, Mr. Chairman, this is not by any means the only objection to be urged against this proposed legislation. Just think of the opportunities which this bill will offer for the exercise of favoritism if it is enacted into law. When once it shall be understood that there is a way by which a large number of second lieutenants can be transformed in an instant into full-fledged colonels, it is not difficult to believe that those commanding political influence would at once bring it to bear in their favor.

That this bill is open to this very grave objection can not be denied, and it is for that reason largely that I am opposed to it. I do not believe there is anything in the argument that it is necessary to increase the rank of the chief of constabulary in order to increase his dignity and authority. I believe that a constabulary commanded by a captain of the Regular Army would command the same respect and wholesome fear as if commanded by one who had the rank and title of brigadier-general.

And I can not see that any good can possibly come from this sort of legislation. I believe, with all due respect for those who are urging the passage of this measure, that its chief purpose is to exalt and to increase the salary of the officer who is now at the head of the constabulary in the Philippine Islands and who, as it happens, is now a captain, but whose friends would like to see him wear a star on his collar.

I do not believe there is anything in the argument that the bestowal of the title of brigadier-general upon the chief of the constabulary would add anything to the efficiency of the force. It may be that the rank and the pay of the present chief is not entirely commensurate with the responsibilities and duties of the position. But, however that may be, it is not a sufficient reason, in my judgment, for the passage of this bill. If the chief should hold the rank of brigadier-general—there are 14 brigadier-generals, any one of whom can now be detailed to discharge the duties of the position—the Commander of the Army has the same authority and right to detail General Wood, or General Bell, or General Carter, or General Funston, all young and vigorous men, to perform these duties that he had to detail Captain Allen.

If this legislation be enacted, it will, in my opinion, cause much friction and engender a great deal of feeling and a great deal of heartburning in Army circles. When young officers are promoted over the heads of those who have seen long service and whose records are the most honorable I shall not be surprised to find that it has created much dissatisfaction in the service, especially in those cases where the promotions are secured through political influences.

For these reasons, I am utterly opposed to this proposed legislation. The reasons advanced in favor of the measure are not, in my judgment, entitled to serious consideration. The gentlemen who are urging it—members of the Philippine Commission, in close contact with Captain Allen and his assistants—may think that the peculiar qualifications of the present chief and his assistants entitle them to higher rank and increased pay. I am willing to concede all that may be claimed for them on this score; but I am not willing they shall have it in the way here proposed. The passage of this bill would necessarily result in much injustice, and perhaps demoralize the service, and I am therefore opposed to it. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I believe the pending bill to be a worthy and meritorious measure, and I believe that when it is properly understood it will have the support of substantially all the members of this committee.

In the first place, it should be understood that the Philippine constabulary is a local police organization. I say a local police organization; it is a military organization created for the purpose of performing both police and military duties of a peculiar local character. The function of policing and preserving order naturally belongs to the local government, and that work has been assumed by the insular government of the Philippine Archipelago.

The constabulary is a force of this character, composed of natives enlisted for a period of two years; and the annual expense of maintaining the organization has been $250 per capita—a million and a half of dollars a year. The first question to be determined is, Should the chief of this force have the dignity, the rank, and the pay of a brigadier-general? The chief of constabulary is not, as such, an officer of the Regular Army; his appointment is not made and will not be made by the President of the United States or the Secretary of War. He is an insular officer; and the testimony of General Wright and those best qualified to speak on the question is that the duties and the responsibilities of the chief of constabulary are more important and more exacting than those of a brigadier-general in the Regular Army; and it is the judgment of these men that beneficial results will come from the increased dignity and rank of that officer, as contemplated by this bill.

When that question is determined, it seems to me that practically all other questions are answered. If the chief of constabulary is entitled to this dignity, this rank, and this salary, then it is the business of the civil Commission to go where it may and employ the most efficient man to perform the office.

The Commission has a right under this bill to appoint as chief of constabulary, with the consent of the President, an officer of the Regular Army. The Commission may select a private of the Regular Army or anyone from private life, but if the Commission should select an officer of the Regular Army the insular government saves just the amount of the salary of that officer as such, because the Federal Government will continue to pay him his regular salary, and the insular government will be required to pay only the difference between the salary that he draws—say as captain—and the salary of a brigadier-general. So it will be to the interest of the insular government to appoint, with the consent of the Secretary of War, a Regular Army officer, if an efficient one for this work can be found.

Now, the objection or criticism which was made to the bill, that there might be a conflict of jurisdiction, or that it might result in embarrassment to put a company of scouts, which is an auxiliary of the Regular Army, under control of the chief of constabulary, I think it utterly without force. When this bill is read and analyzed, it will be discovered that companies of scouts can only be detailed by the consent of the Army officer in charge of that division, and when they are in action—so detailed in performing local police duty in the maintenance of order—the bill says they must be under some particular leadership, under some responsible head, and the chief of constabulary must be in control in performing this purely, this necessarily, domestic police duty.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman explain how this chief of constabulary will have any additional power by reason of his assignment or his rank and pay as brigadier-general?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Any additional power?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Power. He will have additional rank?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He will have additional pay. Now, what additional power, which is the main thing, will come from it?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. He will not have any additional power by virtue of this bill excepting his authority over the companies of scouts that may be detailed to assist him in performing the duties of the constabulary. That is all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will it make any difference what his rank is if companies of scouts are detailed to act under his direction?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why, not necessarily.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all, will it?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No. It is the judgment of the Philippine Commission and of the War Department that in view of the peculiar exactions of that position and its responsibilities the rank and pay ought to be, in justice, that of a brigadier-general. That is the first proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But I understood the gentleman and his colleague on the committee [Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin] to say that the power or the authority that would come from this rank was what was necessary on account of this difficult situation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The only additional authority given to the chief of police is the authority to control and direct the movements of companies of scouts during the time they have been assigned to him to assist in maintaining the local order—in warfare, for instance, against bands of ladrones.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But I call the attention of the gentleman to this fact: Suppose the Commission appointed a civilian to this place, and suppose, at the request of the Commission, regular scouts were detailed to act under this chief of the constabulary, who is a civilian——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Would he not have the same power over those companies of scouts as a man who would be there with the rank of brigadier-general?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Most certainly, and he would have the rank, if the gentleman will heed, and pay of a brigadier-general just the same. The bill gives the rank and pay to the office and not the officer; and it makes no difference who occupies the office, whether a Regular Army officer or a civilian, he is clothed with this power and rank and pay.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman misunderstands me. My question is this: Suppose this bill does not pass, is not a law, and a civilian is appointed chief of the Philippine constabulary, he has no rank except what is implied in that title.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is right.

Mr. FITZGERALD. At the request of the Commission native scouts are assigned to do duty under this civilian who is the chief of the constabulary.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Would not such a man have the same power and authority over those scouts as a man who had been assigned from the Regular Army, and under the operation of this bill given the rank of brigadier-general?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Most assuredly. As I said, the rank and pay and title are given to the office and not to the officer. It does not make any difference who occupies the office, his rank and his pay and authority are the same.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; but the gentleman does not yet comprehend the question. I say, suppose to-day a civilian was appointed chief of the constabulary?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; I will suppose that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Would he not have the same power over the scouts detailed to do duty under him as would anybody appointed under the provisions of this bill, and given the rank of brigadier-general?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have attempted to answer that question in the affirmative three several times. I will say yes, now, catagorically, so that the gentleman will understand my position.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman has been adding that both would have the same rank and pay.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand that the officer now serving as chief of the constabulary is a Regular Army officer?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; he is a captain in the Regular Army.

Mr. MONDELL. And paid from the Federal Treasury?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Paid from the Federal Treasury.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it the understanding that if this bill passes he will probably be retained?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The presumption is that he will, judging from the testimonial to his fitness that is given by General Wright before our committee, although that is a matter for the Philippine Commission to determine. They would have the power to displace him at any time.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman will yield to me——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. With pleasure.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman stated that the rank of brigadier-general would attach to a civilian if he should be appointed.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. HULL. Where does the gentleman find that in this bill? I can not find it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does not the bill say so?

Mr. HULL. No; this bill says officers of the Army.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then I was mistaken about that.

Mr. HULL. My understanding is that this bill only gives rank to officers of the Army when detailed.

Mr. OLMSTED. That is right.

Mr. HULL. And if they desire to select a civilian this bill would have nothing to do with him except in the second section.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Provision is already made for the appointment of a civilian by a local law, which provides for the organization and the appointment of a chief and assistant chiefs. The civil commission already has the power to increase the pay and authority of a civilian selected for that office, but this law is necessary to fix the pay and rank of the incumbent if he should be a Regular Army officer.

Mr. HULL. I think the gentleman is in error when he says a civilian acting as chief would have the rank of a brigadier, or if acting as assistant would have the rank of a colonel. He would be simply the chief of police. This bill would have nothing to do with him except in the second section.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is all. He would have every benefit except the rank. The pay and authority would be determined by the Philippine Commission without an act of Congress.

Mr. HULL. They could fix his pay at whatever they pleased?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Under the provisions of this bill he would have control over companies of scouts assigned to him to assist in maintaining local order.

Now, I want to say that a question was raised in relation to the matter of discipline among the scouts. They would be subject to court-martial just the same while operating under the authority of the chief of constabulary as they are now.

Mr. HULL. Would they be subject to court-martial for disobeying the orders of the chief of constabulary?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I presume so, because this bill puts them under his authority while actually engaged in maintaining order.

Mr. HULL. Then it would certainly be a bad bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, there is another thought on the question of expense. The objection was made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] that the bill was unjust because it would entail unnecessary expense on the islands. Its economy was one of the strongest and most potent reasons urged on the committee in support of the bill.

Conditions in the Philippine Archipelago are peculiar. The legacy of six years of warfare, and of recent infection and plagues of one kind and another, is that ladronism is more threatening to-day than it ever was, perhaps, in the history of the archipelago; and unless this bill shall be passed, so that the local government can avail itself, in a measure, of the 5,000 scouts who are located there and doing nothing to-day, it will be compelled to increase the force of the constabulary, and it can ill afford to do so at this time. One of the chief virtues of the measure lies in the fact that it will save thousands and perhaps hundreds of thousands of dollars a year to the new struggling government there. That was one of the strongest arguments that was made by General Wright and other witnesses who testified before the committee.

I believe the bill is meritorious all the way through. In relation to the rank, pay, and dignity of the chief of constabulary I know nothing. I am willing to take the judgment of men who are on the ground, and who are supposed to know something of conditions there; supposed to know what effect the matter of dignity and title may have in maintaining order and respect.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield simply for an inquiry?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand the gentleman states that peace has been established in the Philippine Islands. Now, if that is true, will you tell me why you wish to increase the pay of Captain Allen when war is at an end? He performed good service during the war at his present salary.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I was undertaking to explain that the responsibilities of the constabulary have been greatly increased by reason of recent conditions, and especially the growth of ladronism, conditions that by some disaffected persons have been charged to the change of government. At any rate, the responsibilities of the office have been greatly increased. He commands an army of 6,000, fully as large as a brigade in the Army, which I understand to be about 6,000.

Mr. HULL. Less than 6,000.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And this force of constabulary is scattered over an archipelago composed of a great many islands, and where there is a constant menace upon the peace of the people by bandits and ladrones and a disposition to ascribe to the new government some responsibility for the distresses that exist there now. It is necessary to have an alert, broad-minded, courageous man at the head of the organization. There is no more responsible position possibly in the Regular Army at this time, outside of the Commanding General or the Secretary of War, than the chief of the constabulary of the islands.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Certainly.

Mr. ESCH. I understood the chairman of the committee to say that there are now four assistant chiefs, three being in active service. There is nothing in the bill to prevent the appointment of as many assistant chiefs as the Commission see fit. Will you favor a limitation of the present number, making it four?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; I would not, because the bill creating the constabulary was designed and enacted by the Philippine Commission, and that Commission is infinitely better qualified to determine what force should exist there and what officers it should have than we are. I say that we ought to rest that discretion with the Commission, and if an increased number should be necessary the Commission will doubtless increase the number. If we leave it as it is, the present number of four assistant chiefs may be all that will be required. There are only three in active duty now.

Mr. ESCH. You think it is sufficiently safeguarded without making any limitation as to number?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think so. There may conditions arise that would make an increase in the number necessary, and the Commission ought to have authority to make that increase.

Mr. ESCH. Without limitation you understand there will be constant efforts made to have the Commission increase the number.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The same as there is always an effort to increase the number of officers on the civil list. We must in a large measure rely upon the patriotism and good judgment of the members of the Commission.

Mr. WHEELER. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him to explain a statement made by him?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It will not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. I would like to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would just say to the gentleman from Indiana that I promised——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am not asking time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will yield so that the gentleman from Kentucky may ask one question of the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. For one question and for the gentleman from Indiana to reply.

Mr. WHEELER. A few moments ago the gentleman stated that unless this bill became law the constabulary there now doing nothing would be greatly increased. I desire to ask him why that would be?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman misunderstood me. I said unless this bill became law the constabulary would be increased, because the scouts that are made available under the bill, and who are now there doing nothing, would render no assistance.

Mr. WHEELER. Why?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The scouts are idle, who are simply performing general military service, and in no sense available at present for police purposes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I decline to yield further. How much time has the gentleman from Virginia remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty-six minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How much time is there remaining on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-six minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that I have to differ with my Democratic colleagues as to the propriety and wisdom of the pending bill. To my mind there is no principle here involving any position that we on this side of the Chamber have contended for.

It is a simple question of giving the chief of the constabulary of the Philippine Islands the rank and pay of a brigadier-general during the time that he occupies the position as chief. I listened to the testimony before the committee, and I came to the conclusion that this bill was a proper one and one that should be passed. Now, it seems that Captain Allen is a man singularly fitted for this important and delicate task. He is a Kentuckian by birth, a man who has rendered in the past conspicuous service to his country, led an expedition to Alaska, is a linguist of rare attainment, speaking Spanish, and is thoroughly acquainted with the customs and habits of the oriental people. Vice-Governor Wright, a man in whose ability and in whose integrity and in whose patriotism I have the most unbounded confidence, speaking in behalf of the Commission, testified before the committee that probably without an exception in the Regular Army, without reflecting upon the Regular Army, there was no man more peculiarly fitted for this service than Captain Allen; that he was taking great interest in this work; that it was an important work, and that he had under his command and under his control and subject to his order 6,000 native Filipinos who were intended at last to supplement the Regular Army in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I have only five minutes, so I wish the gentleman would make it short.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to ask the gentleman if Captain Allen ever had any experience in police duties before.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Oh, this is a great deal more than police work; it is a work which the Commission has undertaken wisely and well, and from our standpoint, from the Democratic standpoint, it is good legislation. We are complaining about the immense cost of the Regular Army. The proof before the committee shows that these Filipinos will work, and do work, for very much less than the men in the Regular Army are paid. It shows that they are more effective in a great many ways than the Regular Army would be, because they know the people, they know the country, and they know the situation. When these men are properly officered and properly disciplined, as they are now under the direction and command of Captain Allen they form not onty a valuable adjunct to the Regular Army but according to the present plan they will in time take the place of the Regular Army in those islands.

Now, this bill came before the committee with the hearty indorsement of General Wright and of the whole Philippine Commission, and with the hearty indorsement of the military department, including the adjutant-general and the Secretary of War, and, so far as I view it, it is a proper measure and one that is entirely in accord with the Democratic idea of reducing the cost, and reducing the army, in the Philippine Islands. There are other provisions in this bill, Mr. Chairman, that I would like to discuss, but my time is up. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. If the chairman of the committee does not wish to occupy any further time at present I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL. There are many of the features of this bill that I am in hearty sympathy with. I have no objection to using the Filipino scouts in a proper way to help preserve peace in the islands; they are there for that purpose. I do object, however, to many of the provisions of this bill. In section 1 it is provided that one officer of the Army may be detailed for chief of the constabulary, and while so acting shall have the rank and pay and allowance of a brigadier-general of the Regular Army. I recognize the fact that the chief of constabulary should be a man of high rank in order to carry weight, but we have in great abundance brigadier-generals of the Regular Army, some of them who have never been able to find anything to do outside of Washington and mere clerical duty, and it does seem to me that this bill should be amended so as to provide for the detail of a brigadier-general of the Regular Army for that purpose, if they want an officer of this rank.

I object to the provision as to assistant chiefs because there is absolutely no limit to the number that they may detail. They may take twenty-five or thirty lieutenants over there that have been able to ingratiate themselves with the powers that be—I am not reflecting upon the Commission in that—and appoint them assistant chiefs, and while so acting they shall have the rank and pay and allowances of a colonel in the Regular Army. I am absolutely opposed to that provision. If they want assistant chiefs of a higher rank, we have a great abundance of them, and if we are to have no additional wars in the immediate future, we will be glad to keep some of them in active service in a new position, and to my mind it would do them good. You can provide for the detail from the Regular Army of officers not below the grade of lieutenant-colonel, so there is no expense entailed on the Filipino government and no harm will come to the Government of the United States, as no additional pay is entailed; and if no one else moves it, I shall, when the proper time comes, move to strike out the first section and insert those provisions.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. I wish to make an inquiry for information. I do not know much about war or military affairs; but, as I see from the report here, there are 6,000 native Filipinos of one character who are now in the Regular Army.

Mr. HULL. About 5,000.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Now, what reason is there why the Commander in Chief of the Army can not under the present law detail any officer he may select?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. He may.

Mr. HULL. Those Filipino scouts are a part of the Regular Army. I do not care to go into that question now, because I do not know that I should have time. They are officered by Regular Army officers, field officers especially; and the captains and lieutenants are taken from the Regular Army or from those who have had long service in the volunteer forces. They are as much a part of the Regular Army as the men enlisted in the gentleman's State or mine, except that the understanding is that they are enlisted for service in the Philippine Islands only, and can not be ordered elsewhere.

Mr. ALEXANDER. How many of those scouts are there?

Mr. HULL. Five thousand, in round numbers. It seems to me that the Congress of the United States for every reason on earth should not put an additional burden upon the Philippine government. That government is running behind financially; it has had misfortunes, and has added to its deficit by reason of cholera, by reason of the great pest that has carried off their draft animals. And from my investigation in the Philippine Islands I do not believe we are going to be let off with one appropriation to help carry on that government. Taking this bill alone, we may say that it amounts to but little; but then there are in that archipelago to-day, as I remember, about 40 civil governments. Is it not fair to presume that they would want at least 40 assistant chiefs, so that each of these governments might have the services of one of these officers?

I do not think they need as many as that. I do not know that they would call for as many; but we can obviate all expense upon that government, which is confessedly to-day knocking at the doors of Congress for relief—confessedly running behind in its revenues as compared with its present expenses—we can obviate all expense to the government there and at the same time obtain just as good administration, if we allow the detail of these officers of the Army of such rank as they desire. In this way the purpose desired can be served as effectually as by taking a single officer of the Army and giving him the high rank proposed by this bill. Our Government has dealt liberally with the Army. We have given the officers high rank, compared with what they have had in the past—beyond the dreams of the men of the Army of six years ago. It is time, in my judgment, to call a halt. Let us keep the rank of the Army substantially at what it now is, instead of continuing to add to it in time of peace.

If we have no brigadier-generals competent to discharge the duties of chief of this organization, the President of the United States has it in his power almost every month in the year to select a man having the ability to command these policemen and to make him a brigadier-general of the line without increased expense.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield a moment?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In the absence of a military government over there, and in view of the law of July last, now on the statute book, would the President of the United States have any authority whatever to detail a Regular Army officer to command the police force there?

Mr. HULL. Yes; Captain Allen is detailed; but the gentleman has misapprehended my argument. I suggest that we pass this bill with an amendment providing that a brigadier-general of the Army may be detailed as chief of constabulary; and if there should be no brigadier-general in the Army to-day competent to discharge these duties, it would not be sixty days until the President would have the power, by reason of vacancies, to nominate and appoint as brigadier-general a man of sufficient ability to discharge those duties. I am not antagonizing the proposition to confer this power; I believe it ought to be done. I am only antagonizing the proposition to give the power to appoint to this position a lieutenant or a captain as chief and make him a brigadier-general; and I am taking that position for the reason that we have to-day on the active list of the Army so many brigadier-generals that we can spare one for this duty in a time of peace without crippling the service in any way whatever. As I have stated, I shall offer that amendment and appeal to the House to adopt it.

Now, one word as to the propriety of appointing to this position a second lieutenant. I do believe that this, as it stands, is a dangerous proposition, and if what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has said be true, it is more dangerous than I thought it was. At first I took it for granted that this chief was to act under the command of a Regular Army officer, but if, according to the gentleman's statement, a civilian may be put in as chief or assistant chief, and these men be under his control, to be court-martialed if they do not obey his order, or court-martialed if they do obey, it would be putting the Regular Army and these scouts and officers "between the devil and the deep sea."

It seems to me that an amendment should be made there clearly defining the fact that when these scouts are ordered into service—and I do not care if you say all of them, they ought to be used for preserving the peace of the islands—they are under the command of the chief and assistants only when the chief and assistants are in the field and not sitting in Manila. For instance, I would not be willing to vote for any law that would put an officer of the Regular Army under the command of a police officer, as this would do.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Who says that?

Mr. HULL. I think the second section says it, and if the gentleman will wait, I will tell him why.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from Iowa permit me to suggest this? I can not see how it is possible to put any such construction on the bill. This bill simply provides for the detailing of officers of the Army.

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, the mention of one thing is the exclusion of another.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman misapprehends my argument again, because, I have no doubt, I have not been clear; for I know he is a very good lawyer and understands arguments very thoroughly. Here is an assistant chief with the rank of colonel. He sits in Manila or Iloilo or Cebu at his headquarters. He orders the scouts to report to Dagupan or any other point where they have a constabulary, and report to the inspector of that constabulary for further orders. The officer goes there. He may be a major of the Regular Army, a graduate of West Point, a man who has spent twenty or twenty-five years in the service of his country, and when he reaches there under the direction of this chief he has to take the field for the purpose of arresting the ladrones and preserving the peace and establishing order, protecting life and property, and under this bill as it stands to-day he must obey the orders of that inspector.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman permit a question? I think he misunderstands the language of the bill. It says that the scouts may be ordered to assist the Philippine constabulary, and may be placed under the command of officers serving as chief and assistant chiefs and not as civilians.

Mr. HULL. But any of the officers below the chief are civilians.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULL. I would ask for a few moments more.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. HULL. I do not know that I shall take that much time. The gentleman's contention and my argument do not run opposite to each other. It is true that they are under the officers serving as chief or assistant chiefs. Those chiefs and assistant chiefs, as a rule, can not be in the field in the different places. They issue their orders from headquarters, and while the scouts are executing that order they are under the command of the constabulary officer in the locality or part of the country where they are serving.

If that is not so, and they do not desire that contention to be made against the bill, it is perfectly easy to obviate it by a little amendment providing they shall not, when serving in the field, be under the command of any officer of the constabulary other than chiefs or assistant chiefs of the constabulary—not in that language exactly, but covering that idea; so that it is easy to obviate that. As it is to-day, you might as well legislate for Alaska that whenever the troops are called into action there for the preservation of the peace, they shall be under the command of the chief of police. I do not believe this Government desires any such action as that. I may be mistaken. I know I am not as good a lawyer as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], and I am not as good a lawyer as the Secretary of War; but I can not look at it in any other light except that it is putting the Army under the command of peace officers, for these constabulary are nothing more than peace officers, no matter whether you say they have more to do than they have in this country or not. I shall, when that section is reached under the five-minute rule, if no one else does, offer an amendment to make it clear that these men, the officers of the Regular Army, are not to be superseded in command of their own troops by civilians.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit one question? I call his attention to the last two lines or the last three lines on page 2, section 2, and then ask him to see if it is possible for him to put any such construction upon the bill as he does?

Mr. HULL. Yes; "may be placed under the command of officers serving as chief or assistant chiefs of the Philippine constabulary, as herein provided."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One moment; "as herein provided," and then the only provision in the act is for officers of the Army.

Mr. HULL. That is right.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How can a civilian come in under that?

Mr. HULL. I thought I stated that before. The chief sits in his office at Manila and he orders a battalion of Philippine scouts to report. I said before, at Dagupan—and that will answer as well as any other place—to the inspector of police in command of that department, and to obey his orders in preserving the peace or punishing criminals. He is simply under the orders of the chief, as the inspector is under orders, and he places the officer of the Army in such shape that his rank would not give him the command that it ought to on account of his rank. In other words, he supersedes rank, and when the assistant chief ordered him to obey the orders of this inspector, in my judgment, under the terms of this bill, he would be compelled to obey the orders of the inspector, in place of having command of his own troops. It is through the chief that the order is given. Now, I do not believe that is good administration. And it is so easy to make it clear that such a thing as that can not occur, that I shall offer an amendment to correct that part of the bill when we reach it.

I thank the gentleman from Virginia for his courtesy.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I listened with much interest to the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs [Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin], and to the reasons which he gave for that provision of the bill which permits the detailing of any officer of the Army to fill the place of chief or assistant chief of the Philippine constabulary, and to receive the rank and pay of a brigadier-general or a colonel during the detail.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] laid particular stress upon two things, first, that it was necessary to have a particularly robust and healthy man in this place, because the duties were such that it required a man of much activity; and second, that a man was required who was peculiarly fitted for the work demanded of the head of this force. He then stated that the present occupant of the place possessed these two requirements in a peculiarly eminent manner.

I have in my hand a copy of the hearing before the gentleman's committee, which contains a statement of the record of the gentleman who at present is chief of that police. I do not wish to say anything disparaging of him. I am unacquainted with him, and, perhaps, indeed, in some fields he has had a peculiarly brilliant record, but this testimony certainly creates a suspicion that he is not the robust and energetically healthy man required for this place.

Colonel Edwards, speaking before the gentleman's committee, said of him:

> He made a wonderful trip to Alaska, as may be recalled by some members of the committee. He was a pioneer there. His health was impaired by hardships he encountered living on rotten moose meat.

Further on, speaking of a trip he made with General Lawton around the Bay of Santiago during the campaign there, he said that "he nearly died from his experience." If these things qualify that gentleman, in the opinion of the Commission, as being particularly robust and healthy, certainly some of the brigadier-generals can not be so slow and slothful in their movements and their health can not be so much impaired by the peaceful occupations to which they have been assigned during their careers as to unfit them for equal physical fitness.

It is said that peculiar qualifications are required for this place; that its duties are different from those required of the ordinary military man. The duties must be either of a military nature or a police nature or of both kinds combined. There is nothing in the testimony which shows that Captain Allen has ever had any experience in the organization or control of a police force. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] says he knows of no brigadier-general as well equipped for this place as Captain Allen. Let me call the gentleman's attention to one, a man whose military ability is not questioned, and who has had practical experience in the management and handling of the greatest police force in this country, Gen. Fred Grant, a brigadier-general, a man eminent, I take it, in military circles, who served as a member of the police board of the city of New York with the present President of the United States. He has had that peculiar experience required in a man in this position. If anybody in the Army is competent to organize and control a police force I take it that General Grant is the man.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. General Fred Grant was a police commissioner of the city of New York, I believe.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Do you believe there is any similarity between the service rendered by a man who sits in a cushioned chair in one of the blocks of the city of New York as a police commissioner and a man who heads the police force of the Philippines, chasing ladrones, thieves, and murderers through the mountain fastnesses of that archipelago?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman assumes two things that are not facts. First, he assumes that the commissioner of police in the city of New York sits quietly in a chair. He is the most mistaken man that ever lived in that assumption. Nobody lives a more strenuous life than the police commissioner of the city of New York.

The time of Mr. FITZGERALD having expired, Mr. JONES of Virginia yielded to him two minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the gentleman's second statement, that the chief of constabulary of the Philippine Islands, with 6,000 men under him, devotes himself to chasing around the country, personally hunting up criminals, he is much mistaken. I fear he knows little of the conditions there himself. It is absurd to think that this man is doing the actual work of hunting criminals. He is a man who commends himself to the Commission, from their statement, by reason of his peculiar executive and administrative ability. If you want sleuths, ordinary detectives, or policemen, you do not want an officer of the Regular Army. It has already been stated that General Funston was a particularly active brigadier-general. The truth of the matter is, that this is a vicious bill. There is a growing tendency to detail men from the Army and Navy to serve in civil positions and to give them pay in addition to that provided by law. This is a good time to stop the practice. The curse of Cuba and the Philippine Islands was that the Government of Spain inflicted rulers and officials upon the people of those islands and compelled them out of their own treasury to pay the officials' salaries and the expenses. Gentlemen, let us stop it! While we are governing these people let us give them some chance. The way to do it is to strike out of this bill the provision that gives additional work and pay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield ten minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I think that with all due deference to all the utterances I have heard in connection with this bill, that the funniest thing about it is the bill itself takes itself seriously, and the advocates of the bill are taking themselves seriously. It is the most magnificent and strenuous piece of opera bouffe that has ever thrown itself athwart the popular horizon since the Mikado appeared. I can see all the natives of the Philippines bowing down, with hands extended and foreheads in the dust, crying "Kickapoo! Kickapoo!" every time the chief of police appears with brigadier-general's epaulets. Why, Mr. Chairman, we were informed here in Washington, with all the gravity of the admiral in Pinafore, that long ago the Philippine Islands had been pacified, with a great big "P"—completely pacified, and all that we needed was a little police service, with another great big "P."

Now they tell us in order to have a proper police the chief of police has to be a brigadier-general, and that all the captains of police have to be colonels. And they tell us that even the Philippine Commission, with its plenipotentiary and imperial powers, can not make a little brigadier-general of their own, an insular brigadier—a brigadier appurtenant. They say that we have got to tie him to the Regular Army of the United States as a "continental brigadier."

Mr. Chairman, the bill is just a part of the general scheme of legislating into existence new positions and places of emolument, thus giving ties of private interest more and more for the purpose of tying more and more men to the permanent occupancy of the Philippine Islands by ties of private interest. The more fellows you get to fill positions of rank and emolument out in the Philippines, with influence outside of the Philippines, the less chance there is in favor of a reconsideration upon the part of the American people of the foolish and un-American position they have taken there, a position which has threatened the existence of the Monroe doctrine, that has demanded either an explanation or an amendment, I do not know exactly which, of that old time-honored doctrine at the hands of the President for the reconsideration of the other powers of the world.

Mr. Chairman, the thing would be ridiculous if it were not happening in the Congress of the United States and were not recommended "officially" by a very high character of people, with magnificent intelligence and good patriotism upon other questions. Do we need an army to make war in the Philippine Islands or do we not? If we do, then we want an army with a brigadier-general. Are the Philippine Islands pacified, and is all we need a police power? In that case all we want is a chief of police and a lot of good captains and good privates of police in the various islands. Are we struggling only against ladrones, thieves, and bandits? Then, all we want is the civil arm and its police power. If we are at war, we want an army; and if we want an army, we want it right, with a regular brigadier-general, not an opera bouffe gendarme fellow. The gentleman from Wisconsin has told us that what we needed was some one who was "young, efficient, and experienced" as the chief of police, and the gentleman from New York has suggested the name of Gen. Fred Grant, because he is already a brigadier-general and has already been a chief of police. Then my friend from Wisconsin responds by asking a question as to whether the gentleman from New York finds any analogy between the duties of a chief of police in New York City and in the Philippine Islands. Why, he has himself, his party, and the newspapers on the side of his party have already found the analogy, and it was not left for my friend from New York to seek.

They have told us, not once but many times, that we have "pacified" these people over there; that they love us; that they are desirous of our rule. They are the exception to the general rule of all history that no people seek slavery; that they, on the contrary, are seeking military, water-cure liberty—canned liberty—shot into them by a Krag-Jorgensen rifle as a particular Christmas gift from the American people; that we have gone there on a mission from the All High, put there by Him and not by ourselves, and that we are there so that we can not even get out without a special dispensation from God; that we have earned the gratitude of these people and they are completely "pacified," and all we want is "police," and now in this bill they tell us we want an army of police, with epaulets and high salaries and a sort of "Kickapoo" authority, so that the natives may be impressed by them whenever they come out on gala days with the brass bands and all the balance of the accompaniment of imperial sway. [Laughter.]

If this thing were once dramatized and put upon the boards it would go further than anything that has ever taken place in the so-called Rudyard Kipling "strenuous life" of the Anglo-Saxon to render the race laughable than anything I have ever read about. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that there is no minority report against this bill. The motion to report it was made by the gentleman from Tennessee, who has advocated its passage here to-day.

I have rarely known, since I have been a member of the House, a more complete misapprehension of the facts nor a more unjust intimation of wrongful motives than I have listened to in this debate.

The idea that such men as Governor Taft and his associates upon the Philippine Commission, and Vice-Governor Wright, who was here and testified before our committee, and Secretary of War Root, and General Corbin, and General Young, and Colonel Edwards would advocate a plan by which the Philippine Commission would appoint two, three, or four hundred colonels, and bankrupt the treasury of those islands! The mere statement of the proposition is enough to show its absolute unfairness.

A moment ago the gentleman from Mississippi said that although we have been often told that there is peace in the Philippines, yet to-day we are demanding epauleted officers at the head of the insular police force now trying to suppress the insurrection still continuing. How unfair that is! There is peace in the islands; the soldiers have surrendered and given up their guns; yet there still remains something of disorder, and no gentleman ought to know better than the gentleman from Mississippi what that disorder is. It is neither insurrection nor rebellion. It is not war. It is ladronism, robbery, murder, brigandage, which has existed there for three hundred years. It comes to us as a part of the inheritance which we received from Spain through the treaty of Paris. The insular government is suppressing it by a constabulary force of native Filipinos. Gentlemen upon the other side, and some gentlemen upon this side, are misled because it has been called a police force. Mention is made of Gen. Fred. Grant as having been one of the police commissioners of the city of New York, and as such discharging a duty akin to that now being performed by the man at the head of the constabulary in the Philippine Islands. Look at the difference.

In New York City they have an ample police force, telephones, telegraphs, street cars, at night brilliantly lighted streets, everywhere abundant means of communication. The Philippines are an archipelago, the land area of which is as large as New York, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Vermont combined, without a decent road in it, with very few telegraphs or telephones, with thousands of acres of forests and of mountain fastnesses infested by professional blackmailers, robbers, and murderers, who live after the manner of mediæval brigands. Is it to be pretended that a police commissioner of the city of New York renders any service as such to fit him to be the chief of the constabulary force of that archipelago?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin think that General Grant is less competent than Captain Allen?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am not here to make comparisons. They are always odious, in the language of an old proverb, which the gentleman from New York will do well to remember before he puts a question of that kind.

I will say, however, that General Wright testified that the Commission had looked over all of the names of officers submitted to them by General Chaffee and could find none of them who was so perfectly fitted for this place as is Captain Allen.

Mr. HULL. I would like to ask the gentleman if the names of any of the brigadier-generals were submitted to them.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not know. General Chaffee submitted the names of those whom he considered to be the best men for this duty, and the commission selected Captain Allen.

The gentleman from New York did what I have occasionally seen a lawyer in a justice's court do—read a part of the evidence and omit that portion which bore against him. He read down to the "moose meat" episode in the career of Captain Allen, including the statement that his health had been impaired as a result of his duties and hardships in Alaska.

His record with troops—

And this the gentleman omitted, of course not with any purpose sinister or otherwise [laughter]—

His record with troops has been excellent wherever he served. He served as military attaché in Berlin and Russia, and made a special report on the Swedish army, I think—anyhow, on the military conditions of Sweden—and at the outbreak of the Spanish war he requested relief in order to come away from Berlin. He had to use the efforts of his friends to get relieved. When he got over here he went to Tampa and saw by the papers that there was a commission of major of volunteers given to him. He did not open the letter, but jumped aboard the transport and went over with the only cavalry to Cuba.

He commanded one troop throughout the Santiago campaign, and went with General Lawton around the Bay of Santiago and made that juncture with Garcia's forces. He nearly died from his experience there. He came back here and was, as I recollect, sent abroad again. When he found that new volunteers were being raised for the Philippine insurrection, he got a commission there and rendered distinguished service in the Philippines. He pacified the province of Leyte and has shown unusual qualifications since. He is a linguist, a man of excellent address, which is so necessary in impressing the natives, and, as I understand, he has been the right bower to the Philippine Commission in establishing their secret service, differentiating between the friend and foe.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman does not mean to do me injustice——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; certainly not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was speaking of this officer's physical ability to fill the position; and I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether I omitted to read anything that had any bearing upon his physical ability or his health.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman spoke of his health being impaired on account of his living on rotten moose meat; and the inference would naturally be that his health is still impaired, because, in the law, when a fact is shown to exist, the presumption is that it continues to exist until the contrary is established.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin allow me to read one statement which the gentleman from New York omitted?

I have never seen a man who exceeded him in capacity for work.

That is from the statement of Governor Wright, which the gentleman read.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I presume the gentleman forgot to read that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I read Colonel Edwards's statement, and I read everything affecting the health of this man.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Not only is this man to command 6,000 men, but if scouts are to be detailed to unite with the constabulary, then he is to have 11,000 native Filipinos under his command. He is to put down and exterminate these ladrones who have been for three hundred years murdering and robbing those people. But, in addition to that, listen to what Governor Wright says:

Governor WRIGHT. In the first place, it is rather an anomalous state of things for a captain to be commanding a body of 6,000 men. It is hardly just to him to impose that responsibility upon him, but aside from that, in order to give him proper weight in dealing with the subjects which properly come under his command, he ought to have a rank commensurate with his duties and responsibilities. The chief of the constabulary has, among his duties, charge of the section of information. He is really the political agent of the insular government. He keeps in touch with everything that is going on in the islands aside from commanding this large body of men. The Commission has been compelled to establish a civil commissary.

The Army commissary being no longer available, under orders issued by the Secretary of War more than a year ago, in order to provide suitable food for its several employees scattered throughout the islands who had no access to the markets and were unable to obtain such food as they were accustomed to, it became necessary to provide them proper subsistence. The chief of constabulary assumed that duty and has organized and is conducting that subsistence department. The Signal Corps of the Army has heretofore carried on the telegraphic system of the islands. The military authorities have been anxious to relieve themselves of that duty and burden. The civil government of the islands is under obligations to take over the telegraphic service as fast as it can find suitable operators, its purpose being to educate the natives as operators, and now it has a telegraphic school in Manila engaged in that work. The chief of the constabulary has assumed that duty and is now organizing a telegraphic and telephonic system covering the archipelago.

I mention these things to show the extent of the duties of the chief and their nature, and I think it obvious from what I have already said, without further elaboration, that he fills a very onerous position, one that involves a great amount of work, and very responsible and delicate work.

But the gentleman from Iowa objects to the appointment of a captain and wants a brigadier-general appointed. The Commission could not find a civilian whom they wanted to undertake this arduous duty. General Chaffee submitted to them the names of six or more officers whom he, as a trained expert, familiar with all the circumstances, thought might be competent to perform it, and the Commission united on Captain Allen. The Commission do not wish to be limited to brigadier-generals nor even to major-generals. They wish to have the power to select, as Governor Wright says, the best man, no matter who he may be. To-day they are bound to select Army officers, because they are the men best fitted for this duty, by reason of their military training. The objection raised by the gentleman from Iowa to this bill is untenable, because the bill does not provide for the appointment of any civil officer, a man who is now a civil officer, to take that place. It says, "officers of the Army of the United States"——

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman will permit, I corrected the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] when he made that statement, and said that I did not believe under the bill that it dealt with civilians at all.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Who made that statement?

Mr. HULL. The gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If he did make the statement, I think he is entirely under misapprehension. I call the attention of the committee to the language of the bill.

Officers of the Army of the United States may be detailed for service as chiefs and assistant chiefs of the Philippine constabulary.

We asked Governor Wright if some man in civil life there could not be detailed and the governor said yes, but that they did not know where to find any civilian who was competent.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my friend please tell me who controls this Captain Allen—whether he is under civil or the military authorities?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. When he is detailed he will be under the control of the Philippine Commission, I suppose, if he is detailed under this bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has he not been under the control of the Philippine Commission during its existence?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But the attorney-general over there, or the man who is the legal adviser, has raised this point, that a man in the employ of the United States Government and receiving a salary can not have that salary increased by the Commission; at least they have refused to pay any additional compensation to Captain Allen. The Commission desired to give him a larger salary, but could not do it because of the legal objection which was raised.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And I want to state to my friend that I think that officer is right in his opinion, and furthermore I say that that officer is a full-fledged Filipino.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes. That is the legal opinion which stands in the way of the Commission itself giving him the money which they think his services entitle him to; and, therefore, we come here, together with the Secretary of War, General Young, General Corbin, the Philippine Commission, and Colonel Edwards, and ask for the enactment of this bill into law. These men say that instead of its proving a burden upon the treasury of the islands it will, in the end, lessen the burden. Right here I wish to call attention to the argument made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] about the island treasury running behind. The treasury runs behind largely because of the decline in the value of silver. It has declined since we passed the civil-government law last spring 30 per cent, and netted a loss to the insular treasury of approximately $1,000,000 in gold. The House did its duty and passed a gold-standard bill——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended such time as he may desire.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has been fixed by the House and it can not be extended by the committee. There are seven minutes still remaining on the other side.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to occupy time?

Mr. CANNON. No; but the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs desired a little more time. I understand that presently we will be under the five-minute rule, when by consent we may have a half hour or an hour.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I think that would be satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. The time could be extended by the committee when we take the measure up under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CANNON. When does the general debate close?

The CHAIRMAN. It closes at the end of two hours.

Mr. CANNON. Has the two hours elapsed?

The CHAIRMAN. There are seven minutes yet remaining on the other side.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I did not expect to occupy the seven minutes, because I recognized the fact that the chairman of the committee would close the debate.

Mr. CANNON. Then the gentleman yields to the chairman of the committee his seven minutes?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. If the gentleman particularly desires it, I yield him that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am greatly obliged to the gentleman from Virginia and to the gentleman from Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in his testimony before our committee Governor Wright said:

The bill is intended to be general and permanent in its application, and is not in the special interest of anyone.

A little later Mr. JONES of Virginia said:

If one of the lieutenant-colonels whose name has been furnished, or a brigadier-general, were assigned to this duty, there would be no necessity for the passage of this act?

Governor WRIGHT. I think even then it would be a desirable act. I think that the officer ought to have the rank, in view of all the responsibilities of the position. I think it gives him more weight and force with the masses of the people and among the Army with whom he has to associate, and all that.

Later he added:

We would endeavor to secure the very best men we could find. The officers who have become brigadier-generals are generally elderly men, who would not care for that sort of work. It is a kind of duty which requires a very alert, driving man, in the full vigor of manhood, and I think you can best get him out of the captains and majors, to be frank about it, and that is what we want.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the difference between the constabulary and the Filipino scouts mentioned in the bill. The Filipino scouts belong to the Regular Army. They are all native Filipinos, under the absolute, exclusive control of Regular Army officers.

The constabulary likewise are native Filipinos, but they have to do what we call police duty, and therefore are under the control of the Commission. Although called constabulary and doing police duty, nevertheless they are subject also to be drawn upon for the general defense of the archipelago, to do military duty in fact, and are frequently engaged in serious conflict. They go out and kill and are killed.

Now, it is the desire of the Government to withdraw our troops from the islands just as rapidly as possible. It is the belief of the Commission and of the War Department that the small number of troops now over there can be very much lessened if we can pass this law, so as to enable the constabulary and the native scouts to be brought together as one force, to be mobilized quickly without any sort of delay, under the control of a Regular Army officer.

And I call the attention of gentlemen upon the other side to the motive that lies behind this bill. It is not a desire to grab salaries, as has been unjustly intimated here. It is not a desire to exercise favoritism toward anybody. It is a desire simply to do what is the best for the people of the Philippine Islands and for the Philippine treasury.

Governor Wright and the officers of the Regular Army say that under this bill these 5,000 native scouts may be put to garrisoning the villages and towns. Then General Allen with his assistants may take the 6,000 constabulary familiar with the country and make a determined, persistent war upon the ladrones and exterminate them. The authorities say that in no other way can this extermination be accomplished.

Under the law as it stands to-day, if these scouts were asked for, the department commander would send to the district commander, and the district commander would send to the post commander, and the post commander would detail a certain number of scouts to assist the constabulary; but he would probably send a lieutenant in command, as they are officered largely by lieutenants.

The man in control of the scouts would represent the Government of the United States, while the officer in control of the constabulary represents the Philippine government, and there would be a conflict of authority.

But under this bill, with all of these soldiers susceptible of being quickly mobilized under the control of the constabulary chief, a brigadier-general, an officer of the Regular Army, there will be no conflict of authority. These scouts may do duty in the villages and towns, while the constabulary go into the mountains and woods and exterminate the ladrones. That is the purpose of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The time for general debate has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. One moment. I want to ask the gentleman how many soldiers we have over there now?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The last I heard we had 18,000.

Mr. GROSVENOR. How many?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Eighteen thousand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That officers of the Army of the United States may be detailed for service as chief and assistant chiefs of the Philippine constabulary, and that during the continuance of such details the officer serving as chief shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of brigadier-general, and the officers serving as assistant chiefs shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of colonel: Provided, That the difference between the pay and allowances of brigadier-general and colonel, as herein provided, and the pay and allowances of the officers so detailed in the grades from which they are detailed shall be paid out of the Philippine treasury.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. After the words "assistant chiefs," in line 4, insert the words "but the said assistant chiefs not to exceed in number four."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 4, after the word "chiefs," insert "said assistant chiefs not to exceed in number four."

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, it has been stated, and I believe it to be a fact, that the law enacted by the Philippine Commission provides that these assistant chiefs shall not exceed four in number. I realize, too, that it would be entirely possible for the Commission to so amend that law at any time as to increase the number to 400 if they desired to do so. If four assistant chiefs, who may be either civilians or second lieutenants as the law now stands, are sufficient, four ought to be sufficient when their rank and dignity has been increased by making colonels of them, and therefore I have offered the amendment limiting the number to what it now is. I understand tnat the purpose and object of this bill is to increase the rank of the chief and assistant chiefs in order to give them more power and authority; and if given this additional rank, what objection can there be to so limiting the number that the Philippine Commission may not increase it at will? This is the object of my amendment. I believe there are only two assistant chiefs now in active service. I may be mistaken as to that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There are three now in active service.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. There is then one vacancy, and the law only permits the appointment of four.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will say that vacancy is not a permanent vacancy, but is one which is to be filled.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I understand. As the law now stands only four assistant chiefs can be detailed from the Army, and, as a matter of fact, there are only three at this time. If my amendment is adopted, and I think it should be, the number never can exceed four, which is the present maximum.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask the gentleman from Virginia or the gentleman from Wisconsin a question, or both of them. I want to say that I was not present in the committee when this bill was considered, and I happened to be out of the committee while the discussion was going on, and I want to see if I understand it. Now, it is necessary to have somebody of the grade of a brigadier-general, or at least to have him detailed from the Army to the Philippines for this service, according to the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. That is the theory of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. That is the theory of the bill; and it seems from the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin right and proper and fairly necessary. Now, this bill is to give the difference between the pay of a brigadier-general payable from the Philippine treasury, to give him that difference during the time that the officer is on detail.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Or, if the Commission should ask for the detail of an officer of the grade of second lieutenant as chief, it would give him the difference of pay between that of a second lieutenant and that of a brigadier-general.

Mr. CANNON. Give him the difference in pay between second lieutenant and colonel.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The difference in pay between that of a second lieutenant and that of a brigadier-general, if he was made chief.

Mr. CANNON. This follows the precedents which there are in this country, if the gentleman from Wisconsin is right. You take, for instance, the engineer officer of the District of Columbia. He gets the difference in pay between his rank and that of colonel.

Mr. HULL. The difference between his rank and that of the other Commissioners.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; the difference in pay between his rank and that of the other Commissioners. I must confess——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The purpose of my amendment is to so provide that if we pass this bill it shall not be in the power of the Commission or anybody else to appoint one, two, three, or four hundred of these assistant chiefs, as could be done if my amendment is rejected.

Mr. CANNON. Now, the gentleman is on the committee, and I presume that he was present at the hearings.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I was present at only one of the hearings.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the gentleman if the bill meets his approval if the amendment is made?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman that it would much more nearly meet my approval. I could not support the bill even were my amendment adopted.

Mr. CANNON. I must confess that if Governor Wright is right—I believe that is the name——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Vice-governor.

Mr. CANNON. As I got his statement in the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin, it seems that he abundantly makes the case for a competent officer upon this detail of the grade of captain or major to receive the increased compensation. I do not believe that the power to appoint ought to be abused, and I am quite content, if they have but three or four there now, to limit it as to number; but when you throw these duties, maybe without end, and with responsibilities upon one who happens to be an officer of the Army, and who has demonstrated his equipment for the work, it seems to me there is much stronger reason to give him the difference in pay than there is to pursue that course in the United States where officers of the Army are detailed to civil positions, as in the case of the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia. If that is the object of this bill, it seems to me it is wise in its recommendations.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I understand the gentleman from Illinois to say that he thinks it would be wise to limit the number.

Mr. CANNON. I am quite content. I would not want to see two hundred nor would I want to see twenty, even. I understand they have four now.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. They are permitted to have four, but they have at the present only three.

Mr. CANNON. I would prefer the limitation, I will say to my friend.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia whether it is his intention to limit simply the number of officers who may be detailed, or to limit absolutely the number of chiefs?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. My purpose is to limit the number of officers. That is what, I think, would be the effect of my amendment.

Mr. OLMSTED. I thought that was the gentleman's contention, and I would suggest that he so amend his amendment as to make it clear that that is the intention, so as to provide that not more than four officers shall be detailed as assistant chiefs.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I think, Mr. Chairman, the Commission should not have the power to appoint civilians as assistant chiefs and to give to them the rank of colonel in the Army.

Mr. HULL. I think the bill has nothing to do with civilians; it only deals with officers.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. That is my idea, and therefore the amendment is drawn in the way it is. I think the bill deals only with military officers.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DALZELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 16066. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the use of timber and stone for domestic and industrial purposes in the Indian Territory," approved June 6, 1900; and

H. R. 179. An act to amend the internal-revenue laws.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 53.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return to the Senate Senate bill 3316, being a bill to amend an act to create a new division in the western judicial district of the State of Missouri, approved January 24, 1901.

PHILIPPINE CONSTABULARY BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment if this is the proper time for it to come in.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after enacting clause in section 1 and insert:

"That one brigadier-general of the Regular Army of the United States may be detailed as chief of the Philippine constabulary, and assistant chiefs of constabulary may be detailed from officers of the Regular Army not below the grade of lieutenant-colonel."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, just a word in regard to this amendment. I recognize the fact that they ought to have there an officer of a higher rank than captain, but it seems to me that the Army, as organized to-day, has brigadier-generals, able, ripe in experience, and many of them being younger men than the present chief. I do not, in this amendment, propose to be put in the position of criticising Captain Allen in any way. He has been a deserving and gallant officer; but it does seem to me that when we are legislating for the appointment of a high rank in the Philippines that we have an abundance of high ranking officers in our country to fill that position. There is no use in ignoring the brigadier-generals and the colonels in our Army and creating this high rank out of a subordinate officer of the Army. Instead of putting upon the Philippine government the expense of paying the difference, we ought to avoid that by giving them the opportunity to select an officer from the Regular Army.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend will allow me, take Captain Allen, the present incumbent, who is a captain. Now, then, he is in the performance, as I understand it, of his duty.

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. He can not be continued if the gentleman's provision should prevail. After all, I suppose the average age of a brigadier-general in the Army is what—55 or 60?

Mr. HULL. We have several under the age of 50, and some are put in for the mere purpose of retiring, so the average age is not a fair statement.

Mr. CANNON. Well, it takes a man who graduates at West Point until he is 55 or 60 before he can be a brigadier-general by promotion.

Mr. HULL. I do not know how it will be hereafter, but we have brigadier-generals—four of them—that are now under 50 years of age.

Mr. CANNON. After all that is said and done in this service I will ask if it is not the man we want, and if he is young, virile, and vigorous, and ambitious, if he happens to be a captain or a major, he is the very man for the service. Why should we say that that virile man should be displaced? Why should we place it out of the power of the Government to utilize the services of such a man that we may perhaps protect a brigadier-general? The brigadier-generals may be competent for this particular duty, and they may not be as competent as many thousands of other people. What we want is the services of the most capable men.

Mr. HULL. If I believed that we had no brigadier-generals competent to discharge these duties I would not have offered this amendment. The gentleman from Wisconsin stated that the man was selected out of a list of names submitted by General Chaffee. I want to make a prediction that the list submitted by General Chaffee did not contain an officer above the rank of major to select from.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. That is true; the report shows it.

Mr. HULL. Not one above the rank of major. General Funston is a younger man than Captain Allen.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. And General Wood.

Mr. HULL. And General Carter, late of the Adjutant-General's Office. When you say that that class of men can not perform this duty, you are, in my judgment, casting a reflection upon them.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word just at this point?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Is it the rule that the brigadier-generals have shown the same efficiency in service as the few younger officers that you mention, who won their spurs long before they were brigadier-generals, by actual service—not by virtue of wearing epaulets?

Mr. HULL. Every man whom I have mentioned won his spurs in our recent war, as I understand it, by efficient service, by his superior abilities, and superior soldierly qualities. That is the only excuse for making them brigadier-generals. If not superior ability, what was it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If we have but one man left in the United States, including the Territories—where the Constitution does not go of its own motion—capable of being the chief of police out there, has not the President of the United States the power now to appoint that man brigadier-general?

Mr. HULL. Certainly. I spoke of that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If he is the only man fitted for the position, would it not be just as well instead of creating this assimilated rank which has always given so much trouble in the Army organization to simply appoint Captain Allen and allow it to be understood that the President has decided that there is nobody else capable of running a police force over there in those islands?

Mr. HULL. In reply to that suggestion, let me say that in my argument during the general debate on this bill I stated that hardly a month passes when the President of the United States does not appoint a brigadier-general, and if there is but this one man competent for that office, then, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, it need not be sixty days before the President may recognize his great ability and make him a brigadier-general without increasing the number of brigadier-generals in the Army of the United States.

Mr. BINGHAM. How large is this constabulary force?

Mr. HULL. Six thousand, as I understand. I think this officer ought to be a brigadier-general. If my amendment should not prevail, I should say that the first section of the bill ought to be adopted. The second section is a different proposition.

But it does seem to me that at this time, when we know we are going to be called upon to vote at least $3,000,000 to aid the people of those islands—and we ought to vote relief to them in their present condition—we ought not, without some very grave reason, to saddle any additional expenses upon the people of those islands. If I believed that they would not be as well served under my proposition, if I believed that the chief selected would not be as efficient—and I certainly can say that without reflecting upon a gallant officer now serving there—if I believed that this new chief would not be as efficient and would not render as good service as would be rendered under the provisions of the bill, I would not be in favor of the amendment.

But I am not willing to concede that with the young men now wearing the star, gained by active service in the field—young men who have shown their ability to command, their ability to stamp out lawlessness in the Philippine Islands, as several of our brigadier-generals have done who are younger than this man (to answer the suggestion of my friend from Illinois that these men may not be competent)—I should be in favor of selecting at the next vacancy some man for brigadier-general who is competent to do this work. It is military in its character. The gentleman has correctly so stated. It is not like ordinary police work. It extends over a great scope of country. It requires executive ability. But it seems to me that the man who has won a star by his service in the field has the superior ability to command this force.

Mr. Chairman, if this proposition does not prevail, then it seems to me that in justice to the Filipinos we ought at least to strike out this proviso and let the Government pay the difference directly, and not "beat around the bush" by a sort of pretense that they are paying it, and then reimbursing them by general appropriations for their support.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the committee to the fact that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] is in the nature of a substitute for the section, and the section should be perfected before the proposed substitute is voted upon. Are there further amendments offered to this section?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, to strike out the word "Philippines" in the thirteenth line, and after the word "treasury" add the words "of the United States," and on that amendment I desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk reported the amendment.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I would ask him if he would not accomplish the same thing by striking out the whole proviso?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I make no objection to that.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman strikes out the whole proviso, then the Government does pay.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes. Well, Mr. Chairman, my amendment for the present is as I have stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have the utmost confidence in the personal and official integrity of Governor Taft and Vice-Governor Wright. I know both of them personally. If Gen. Luke Wright would tell me that such and such a thing is a fact of his personal knowledge, I would make no further investigation. He stands just that high as a citizen of Tennessee and as a lawyer. Numbers know him as well as I, no doubt, as vice-governor and commissioner. He stated to me in the Philippines—long before this bill was dreamed of, I take it—that this man, Captain Allen, who at this time had called on him at his house in Manila while I was General Wright's guest, was one of the most efficient officers that they had had connected with the Commission at any time. He left me under the impression, if he did not inform me, that Allen was the man above anyone that they relied on to execute, I believe, the civil processes. If not, he was possibly at the head of the police department then. At all events, he was a peace officer of high rank and was cooperating with the Commission.

Now, who is this man Allen? You may call him captain or brigadier-general or colonel. Titles make no man, Mr. Chairman. When Funston and Young and Grant and the balance of these gentlemen who have been spoken of so highly by the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] and other gentlemen, had done their shooting and their fighting in the Philippine Islands, they then returned to the bosom of their families, to their homes and firesides, while Allen has remained in the jungles and about Manila facing disease and famine, and amidst the terrible struggles of that commission, at his post of duty, doing his whole duty. He seems to me above all others to have won his spurs, not by fighting and then, Mr. Chairman, returning to his home in this country, but by staying there and helping these commissioners, staying there and facing the horrible diseases and the terrible distress of that community.

You may talk to me about General Carter—a gentleman whom I admire—or anyone else. It is not officers but individuals needed there. It is the man who has faced disease, as Luke Wright did when he had yellow fever in Memphis, for he stayed there and was a victim of that disease but recovered. He knows what it is. He knows what it is to find a man as—who is every inch a man—he has in this man Allen and to stand by him, as it seems to me he has done in this case. I have not talked with General Wright; I have not seen him for more than a year. I have called to see him in the city, but unfortunately he was out. I have not read the hearings, heard only the debate to-day and read this report, but I feel, as was well suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], that it is not "officers" we need now, it is a certain man that we want over there to take charge of the premises, and that man it seems is Captain Allen.

Now, Mr. Chairman, so much for that. I do not know whether General Wright and Governor Taft agree to this proviso or not. If they do, I do not. I do not agree that we should take an American officer and pay him out of the treasury of the Philippine Islands, paying him a double salary at that. Captain Allen has done this work. He has done it when we had war, when we had the Samar trouble. He was at work while I was there, yet he did it with the salary he is now receiving, and certainly if he can work for that salary in time of war he should not have a higher salary now in "peace," and particularly when that salary has to be paid out of a bankrupt treasury from the hard-earned revenues and tax money, internal and otherwise, paid by this unfortunate people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin rose.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would ask permission to amend my amendment and move to strike out the whole proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the amendment will be considered as so amended and the Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of the proviso in section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, right at the outset I want to dispose of this apparent anxiety over the condition of the insular treasury. It is entirely temporary, and is due in large part to the depreciation in silver. Since the Philippine civil government act was passed, last summer, silver has declined in value 30 per cent or more, and, as I said a moment ago, has netted a loss to that treasury of approximately $1,000,000. But Governor Wright tells us, and Governor Taft in his letters tells us, that this condition is temporary; that just as soon as the monetary condition is righted by the establishment of the gold standard, and as soon as the most unusual conditions which now obtain there—and which seem inevitably to follow in the wake of war—have disappeared, the normal conditions of a prosperous and overflowing treasury will return to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my friend yield just for a moment?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman says we lost a million dollars, and therefore have a deficit in the treasury; in other words, no money. Now, the President has called for $3,000,000 to take the place of that $1,000,000. It looks to me as though the President is anticipating that there is going to be trouble in the treasury for a long time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Any gentleman with a vivid imagination can scare up a spook with which to frighten himself, especially if he wishes to do it for partisan purposes. There is no trouble about that. Now, the three-million-dollar appropriation act will be passed, if passed at all, with a clause in it requiring the Philippine treasury to reimburse the Treasury of the United States, and the Philippine treasury under normal conditions will be abundantly able to make the reimbursement.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. When is the condition of things there going to be normal?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, I can reply only by saying "in due time."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is going to bring about this normal condition?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It can not come if we are to have needless delays in enacting necessary legislation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That sounds very well, but you know that they have cholera, and yellow fever, and the plague, and everything that a country ought not to have that must be removed before things can become "normal."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Those things are not much worse than some other things with which I am acquainted.

Now, Mr. Chairman, yellow fever, rinderpest, and cholera have nothing to do with this bill nor with the necessity for its enactment into law.

I want to remind gentlemen who dilate upon the condition of the Philippine treasury that there is no man more solicitous than are Governor Wright and Governor Taft to secure and maintain its solvency. No one is more patriotic than is either of those distinguished men, both of whom desire that this bill be enacted into law, and that this charge be placed upon the island funds. Who knows more than they do about the financial condition of the insular government?

The time of Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The question asked by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], as to whether there is "only one man" competent to be chief of the Philippine police, contains an implied argument and a quite effective one, because it tends to put the advocates of the bill in the attitude of belittling the ability of the brigadier-generals of the United States Army. But it was not an entirely fair question. It does not embody the whole truth. There is more in the purpose of the bill than is implied in that question, vastly more. Is it to be supposed that Governor Wright comes here because he and his associates want to appoint a captain to a brigadier-generalship, to the disgrace or humiliation of any officer of the Regular Army? Who believes that Wright or Root or Young or Corbin or Edwards wants to do that? The mere statement of the proposition carries its own refutation.

But aside from that, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the peculiar qualifications required of the head of that force make it necessary that this Commission shall have the power to appoint a brigadier-general, if it wishes to, but that it shall not be bound to appoint a brigadier-general and nobody else to take charge of this exceedingly responsible and oftentimes dangerous duty.

Let me again call attention, as other gentlemen have come in since I read it before, to what Governor Wright says concerning the duties of the chief of constabulary:

Governor WRIGHT. In the first place, it is rather an anomalous state of things for a captain to be commanding a body of 6,000 men. It is hardly just to him to impose that responsibility upon him, but aside from that, in order to give him proper weight in dealing with the subjects which properly come under his command, he ought to have a rank commensurate with his duties and responsibilities. The chief of the constabulary has, among his duties, charge of the section of information. He is really the political agent of the insular government.

He says that the chief is the confidential man of the administration over there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I rise to a point of order. I ask what amendment is pending now?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, to strike out the proviso.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will not make the point; but I suggest the gentleman is not discussing the point.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will not. I hope the gentleman will wait until we reach the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am speaking on that amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That amendment is not pending at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, striking out the proviso, which makes an additional charge upon the Philippine treasury.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I spoke to that first, and then I had five minutes time extended to me, or time without limit.

He is really—

the political agent of the insular government. He keeps in touch with everything that is going on in the islands aside from commanding this large body of men. The Commission has been compelled to establish a civil commissary. The Army commissary being no longer available, under orders issued by the Secretary of War more than a year ago, in order to provide suitable food for its several employees scattered throughout the islands who had no access to the markets and were unable to obtain such food as they were accustomed to, it became necessary to provide them proper subsistence. The chief of constabulary assumed that duty and has organized and is conducting that subsistence department.

Governor Wright says also that this proposed legislation is not to help any particular man nor to secure his promotion. He says that in any event it ought to be law, so that they can select whomsoever they please, and thus secure the very best obtainable man.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin makes a rather remarkable statement in his argument—that this condition of the Philippine treasury is merely temporary and brought about by the decline in silver, or the fluctuation in silver. I think, if the report of the Secretary of War means anything, it is due to the famine, pestilence, and every other devilment that ever afflicted a people on the face of the earth—from rinderpest and by disease that attacked the American and native horses, but one-fourth of the rice crop, and the locusts are about to eat that up. Not only that, but cholera has prevailed in that country, and, as I said before, to-day at least 100,000 of these people are going down under this disease. Thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars have already been gathered from these people to buy rice in China and Japan in order to keep the people down there alive; and yet the gentleman from Wisconsin says that this distress, this temporary deficit in the treasury, is largely the fault of silver.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MADDOX. Let me read this, and then I will answer your question. This is from the Secretary of War asking $3,000,000. He says in his letter to the President:

I beg to ask special consideration of the recommendations of the Commission, all of which have my hearty approval. It seems to me that the conditions resulting from the destruction by rinderpest of 90 per cent of the carabaos, the draft animals of the islands, and the consequent failure of the rice crop, followed by an epidemic of cholera, are so serious and distressing as to call for action by Congress beyond that for which the Commission specifically ask. The removal under the laws of Congress of export duties on goods shipped from the Philippines to the United States has materially reduced the revenues of the islands, while the duties collected in the United States upon importations from the Philippines, which under the same laws were to be turned over to the Philippine treasury and were expected to make good the deficit, have amounted to practically nothing.

Now, that is what the Secretary of War says, and he certainly knows something about it. The gentleman from Wisconsin presumes that there are no other reasons why there is a deficit and why they have no money. Now, my distinguished friend has laid considerable stress upon what General Wright says. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] complimented this military officer who is in charge of this constabulary, and no doubt he is entitled to all the commendations that have been passed upon him here, and says that he stayed down there exposed to disease. I will tell you why he stayed there and faced disease. He stayed there because he was detailed to stay, and my opinion of United States officers is that when they are detailed to discharge a duty they do it, in the Philippines or elsewhere.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why did not the others stay?

Mr. MADDOX. Because they were ordered home. I will say to you, my distinguished friend, that there are a number of them down there now—15,000—and a number of them have been there all the time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why did they order the "brigadier-generals" home and leave Captain Allen there?

Mr. MADDOX. I do not know; I have not an idea about that. But I undertake to say that if any officer in the Army that I ever heard of had been detailed to stay there he would have been there now, the same as Captain Allen. So there is nothing in that.

My friend from Wisconsin places particular stress upon what Governor Wright says. I guess he is all right. [Laughter.] But he has placed himself in a sort of an awkward position. He comes to the American Congress when he wants us to repeal the tariff, or reduce it to 25 per cent, and says the people are ruined, poverty stricken, and diseased, and all that sort of business, and to-morrow when we are called upon to appropriate $3,000,000 to help these poverty-stricken people they are still in that condition. Now he comes under these circumstances pleading for help and for the assistance of this Government to support his Territory, and at the same time comes with a little petition in his pocket to raise Captain Allen to the rank of a brigadier-general, and he insists that these charges shall be placed upon the treasury of the Philippine Islands. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, in reply to what the gentleman from Georgia has said about the proposed appropriation of $3,000,000, I wish to inform him that Governor Taft has written to me, as he has probably to other members, as to what they desire to do with that money. As I said, there will be a provision in the bill for the government of the islands to reimburse the United States. It is proposed by the Commission to take that money and buy carabaos. They are the animals, the water buffalo, which are used in the islands for the cultivation of rice. That is the staple food product of the islands. The killing by rinderpest of nine out of ten of the animals has resulted in the failure of the rice crop, because they of necessity use those animals in its cultivation. But by giving immediately this money to these islands they can buy a sufficient number of the carabaos, and with proper animals they can at once go to work in the cultivation of the rice crop, which grows so readily there that starvation and famine will at once disappear. That is the plan of the Insular Commission. That is a fact that makes one of the apparently hard conditions, but which is only temporary, as I said a moment ago.

Now, because of the killing of the carabaos and the consequent failure in the rice crop there has been a falling off in the revenue of the islands. As I understand it, there would not have been a deficit if it had not been for the loss of a million dollars by the depreciation of silver, which has gone down 30 per cent since we passed the law last spring. We hope this session to enact a gold-standard law for the islands to bring about financial prosperity there.

Governor Taft and Governor Wright assure the people of the United States that it is only temporary; that the normal conditions will obtain as soon as they get money and carabaos.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, it makes but very little difference as to what the action of this House shall be, whether the poverty in the Philippine Islands results from the depreciation of silver or from the death of the beasts of burden. This amendment that is now pending is a concession that the majority portion of the bill should pass. The gentleman from Tennessee—and I recognize him as a mouthpiece, as one of the leaders of his side, who has given careful attention to this and who speaks by authority—simply proposes to change the method and place of payment. He recognizes the fact that this force should be commanded by a brigadier-general and by four officers with a rank of colonel. And the very fact that he has made the admission that he has, and has not attempted to affect the other portion of the bill that I have referred to, is an indorsement of the bill in its main features.

Now, I do not agree with him, or with my liberal colleague from Iowa, that this added expense should be borne by his constituents or by mine. This gentleman confesses that this additional rank is necessary in order to secure the most efficient service of this constabulary force for the benefit of the people of these islands. It is for their benefit; they alone are the beneficiaries, and they are abundantly able to pay this added ten or twelve thousand dollars. Why should the gentleman from Tennessee, why should my colleague, try to saddle that expense that is solely for the benefit of another, and that other able to pay it, upon his constituents or upon mine?

In my judgment, this is misplaced liberality. Let the people of those islands learn now that they are themselves to pay for the blessings of the better government that they are to have. Let them learn at the earliest moment possible that they must pay their taxes for their expenditures. It is a mistaken charity, in my judgment, for the United States Government to be constantly making donations to meet expenditures of government that they should pay. And I am sorry to see the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], usually so exact, so precise in his views as to where responsibility should rest, who should meet responsibility, who should make payments, trying to saddle upon his constituents this legitimate debt of another people. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, as a rule or policy I would not offer such an amendment as this. Ordinarily I would have the Filipinos support their own government. I have made speeches to that effect on this floor, to which evidently the distinguished son of Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] has listened. And I am glad he shows that he must have honored me by listening to me when I thus spoke. Circumstances alter cases. But here, Mr. Chairman, is a very sad, a very serious, and a very unfortunate condition of affairs in the Philippine Islands, and we are not ourselves altogether free from blame for those conditions. We must admit that we have shot and burned many of their houses down; that we have burned many of them to remove disease; that we have done a great many things over there to intensify the unfortunate condition that has been recently imposed upon that people as the result of the plague, the smallpox, and all kinds of fevers, contagious and noncontagious.

We find the President of the United States and the Secretary of War telling us yesterday that they need, not 3,000,000 of Mexican dollars, if you please, but 3,000,000 of "200-cent dollars" to relieve these people. Yet the gentleman from Wisconsin would have us believe that the financial trouble there is brought about by the fall in the price of silver, although here is a report read to-day by my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX], praying that taxation be reduced, so that those people may bring their products to the United States, that they may fill their pockets, and later on pay the export duties which go into their bankrupt treasury, and showing that every evil flesh is heir to has cursed and is now cursing the Filipinos.

Because of their distressed condition; because they are without homes; because they are sick; because they are dying there by the thousands, as we read and must know; because they have been denied everything short of life itself and often that since they have come on the earth. These conditions, Mr. Chairman, are the reason why the great, the proud, the patriotic people of America should come in now and say, "When we raise the salary of an American officer commanded by American officers, who owes his position and his epaulets, if he has any, to the United States Government, that salary, if it is raised at all, shall be paid by the great and rich Government that raises that salary."

Again, this is but the entering wedge, Mr. Chairman, for increasing other salaries, another reason why I want to offer this amendment—when we pay we will be slow to increase the salary. Raise this salary, let the entering wedge begin here, and where will it end? It is these conditions and these alone that prompt me to take the position in this case that we should rather help these people as we can than send $250,000 or $500,000 to Martinique and elsewhere to help people who do not owe us allegiance—whom we never harmed—who were not afflicted with disease, but who, I am told, were all swallowed up in a volcano—entirely unlike these people, who are suffering by the million and tens of millions in the Philippine Islands from disease, famine, and everything that flesh falls heir to.

Mr. Chairman, I think that if we raise this salary we should pay for it, and that is why I have offered my amendment. Eliminate this proviso and we improve the bill that much at least.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] who preceded the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] stated that the gentleman from Tennessee was always accurate in his statements of fact, and the gentleman from Tennessee now states that the Filipinos are now dying at the rate of ten or fifteen millions at a clip.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I made no such statement. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. The words that the gentleman used were that they were dying at the rate of tens of millions; and I am alarmed——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I said "suffering."

Mr. GROSVENOR. "Dying" was the word; and I appeal——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If we continue your policy over there they will all die.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not know anybody more liable to slay his thousands than the gentleman from Tennessee. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, a more or less jocular remark which I made seems to have a false impression upon my distinguished friend in charge of this bill.

I have brought with me, coupled with my imperfect knowledge of military affairs, which I learned in something like four years' service and not much study, a decided prejudice against what is called in the Army "assimilated rank." It always leads to confusion and always leads to discrimination, and it occurred to me on a cursory observation of this bill that there was going to be a very pronounced reintroduction into the Army organization of what we call "assimilated rank"—taking a lieutenant or captain and making him a brigadier-general, giving him the rank practically, and then turning him back again, changing his uniform back to that of a line officer. It seems to me to be incongruous; but when I hear the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] that this is urged in the interest of a single man—or, in other words, that the single man's interest runs side by side with that of the Government—why, I am not going to put up my judgment and my prejudice against the better knowledge and better judgment of the men who have recommended the passage of this bill. I do not believe in it, so far as I gather from my own observation and experience, and I did think that there was necessarily involved in it a reflection upon the Army of the United States and its brigadier-generals.

Now, I do not believe in any of these powers of discrimination except one, and that one is barred to the President of the United States. If I could have my way about it, the President of the United States, for the conferring of special honors upon a soldier, should have the right to promote a line officer or the noncommissioned officer or a private soldier of the Army to any of the commissioned ranks above him; but, unfortunately, the power of the President of the United States to promote a captain or lieutenant is limited to that of brigadier-general. It always brings confusion. I do not need to refer to instances, and I do not want to discriminate in any remarks I may make, but we all know that a very large per cent of the dissatisfaction which has grown up during the last four years has grown out of the fact that there came here and there a case where it seemed that the President, as Commander in Chief, ought to confer special promotion upon a soldier or an officer, and found himself limited in the line of promotion to the rank of brigadier-general alone, whereas if he could have promoted the officer or officers, or private or noncommissioned officer, to a rank of captain or major or lieutenant-colonel, would have satisfied all the demands of honor and would have led to much less commotion and trouble in the Army. It was in the line of regularity that I asked my question, and I hope nobody will be affected by it in their vote upon this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and the amendment rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HULL) there were—ayes 77, noes 68.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes 74.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, on that I shall demand the yeas and nays in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That any companies of Philippine scouts ordered to assist the Philippine constabulary in the maintenance of order in the Philippine Islands may be placed under the command of officers serving as chief or assistant chiefs of the Philippine constabulary, as herein provided.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the end of section 2 the following:

"Provided, That when the Philippine scouts shall be ordered to assist the Philippine constabulary, said scouts shall not at any time be placed under the command of inspectors or other officers of the constabulary below the grade of assistant chief of constabulary."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I shall simply take the time of the committee to say that it was stated by the gentleman in charge of the bill and by others who advocate the measure that it was not intended to place the troops of the United States under the control of merely police officers. Now, Mr. Chairman, there are no lieutenants in the constabulary, nor captains. They have inspectors of different grades, drawing different salaries. This places the entire force of scouts under the control of the chief and assistant chiefs of constabulary, but does provide, if this amendment is adopted, in my mind, that where they are ordered into action and the chief or assistant chiefs do not take the field, that then the officer of the highest rank will command the organization to carry out the orders of the chief officers of the constabulary force, and I should imagine that my friend from Wisconsin would have no objection to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken and the amendment agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LACEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15510) to promote the efficiency of the Philippine constabulary, to establish the rank and pay of its commanding officers, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, and with the recommendation that, as amended, the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I demand a separate vote on the first amendment of the gentleman from Iowa to the first section.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask that that amendment be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the remaining amendments to the House in gross, after which the amendment upon which the gentleman from Wisconsin demands a separate vote will be submitted to the House. The question is upon all the other amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment upon which the gentleman from Wisconsin has demanded a separate vote.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause in section 1, and insert:
"That one brigadier-general of the Regular Army of the United States may be detailed as chief of the Philippine constabulary, and assistant chiefs of constabulary from officers of the Regular Army not below the grade of lieutenant-colonel."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that that was the first amendment. The first amendment, as I understand, was one offered by myself, that the number of assistant chiefs should be limited to four. That is the first amendment, and that is the only one under the order that could now be voted upon.

The SPEAKER. Was not the amendment which has just been read the only one upon which a separate vote was demanded?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Then what is the point of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I understood the request of the gentleman to be that all the amendments save the first amendment should be voted upon in gross. That was done. Now, the first amendment was an amendment limiting the number of assistant chiefs to four, so that would be the only amendment now to be submitted.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman from Wisconsin distinctly said the first amendment.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. That was the first amendment, and the gentleman distinctly requested a separate vote on the first amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Virginia did not understand all my request. I said the first amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

The SPEAKER. The only remaining amendment is the one which has just been reported, and the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia will be included in the disposition of this. All the other amendments, as the gentleman properly states, have been disposed of in gross.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Including the first amendment?

The SPEAKER. This is all that is left to be disposed of.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I want it distinctly understood that the first amendment is included among those that are adopted; because the language of the Chair was, "all except the first amendment."

Mr. LACEY. I suggest that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] was adopted, but subsequently, however, the whole section was stricken out and a substitute took the place of his amendment.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Not at all, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The House has to dispose of it now.

Mr. LACEY. The amendment of the gentleman from Virginia went out when the substitute was adopted.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands, if this amendment is adopted the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia will go out with the section.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If the substitute is adopted, it carries the whole bill.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I understand that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia was to the first section of the bill as it appears in print; but subsequent to the adoption of that amendment a substitute for that section was adopted.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. A substitute for the whole bill.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands the situation, the Chair will say, in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia was to the first section. The amendment of the gentleman from Virginia has been agreed to, as the Chair understands, but whatever fate the first amendment now receives will affect the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia. So that the question now before the House is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I am satisfied that was not the understanding of the House. My amendment was practically accepted. It was understood that that amendment, limiting the number of assistant chiefs, was practically accepted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to have it distinctly understood by the House, so that there may be no misunderstanding when members vote. As the Chair understands the situation, the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia was adopted. But if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa prevails, which strikes out the first section as amended, the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia will fall with that first section. So the question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 103, nays 103, answered "present" 6, not voting 143; as follows:

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I reserve all points of order on this bill.

Mr. HULL. I give notice now that I shall call this bill up on Monday next if the District Committee should not occupy the day.

RESIGNATION OF COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read a communication received by the Speaker from a member of the House.

MY DEAR SIR: I respectfully resign my place as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
S. W. T. LANHAM.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, this resignation will be accepted. The Chair hears none; and the Chair appoints to the vacancy on the Committee on the Judiciary the gentleman from Texas, Mr. HENRY.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, in order to-day under the rules.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. CAPRON in the chair.

EUGENE H. ELY.

The bill (H. R. 2670) granting an honorable discharge to Eugene H. Ely was read, with the amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STEELE. I should like to hear the report in this case read.

The report was read.

Mr. STEELE. This bill evidently does not belong on this Calendar, and I ask that it be laid aside.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken. The bill will be laid aside as not being properly on this Calendar.

ELVIRA M. COOPER.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12524) granting an increase of pension to Elvira M. Cooper.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elvira M. Cooper, widow of Lieut. Col. George E. Cooper, medical purveyor, United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 6 strike out "Lieutenant-Colonel."

In line 7 strike out "medical purveyor" and substitute "late major and surgeon."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

LEWIS WALTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11199) granting a pension to Lewis Walton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Lewis Walton, and to pay him a pension of $48 per month.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all in the bill after the word "roll" and substitute therefor "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lewis Walton, late corporal, ordnance detachment, United States Army."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

PHILLIP MOONEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14897) granting an increase of pension to Phillip Mooney.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Phillip Mooney, late of Company D, First Georgia Regiment Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 7, after the word "Infantry," insert "war with Mexico."

In line 8 strike out "twenty" and substitute therefor the word "sixteen."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13839) granting an increase of pension to John W. B. Huntsman.

The bill was read, as follows:

JOHN W. B. HUNTSMAN.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John W. B. Huntsman, late of Company C, Ninth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass. If there be no objection——

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I object to the passage of this bill, and I desire to state my reasons for doing so. My service in this House is of such recent origin that my disposition would be to conform to the unwritten custom of the House and remain silent; but, having made this objection, I feel that it is due to myself and to the members of the House and to the constituency which I represent to briefly state some of my objections.

Mr. Chairman, it is a rule of this House that every member shall vote upon every bill unless he has some personal or pecuniary interest in the result of it. This would be a moral obligation resting upon every member of the House in the absence of the law of the House on this subject. It is also the rule of the House that the second and fourth Fridays in each month shall be devoted to the consideration of bills known as private pension bills. The rules of the House, to which I have just adverted, necessarily imply that every member of this body who casts his vote for or against any measure pending before the House shall have some conception of its merits, and that the measure shall have passed muster in some way before his judgment and his conscience. Now, sir, I think I do not overstate it nor misstate it when I declare that so far as the bills——

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point.

Mr. MADDOX. It is that we have no order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is well taken. The Committee of the Whole will come to order. Gentlemen in the aisles will take their seats and cease conversation.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman a question. To what bill is the gentleman speaking?

Mr. RUSSELL. The one just read by the Clerk.

Mr. BROMWELL. What one is that?

Mr. SIMS. Calendar No. 2065.

Mr. BROMWELL. That is House bill 13839?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. BROMWELL. I have no interest in that.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not think I misstate it nor overstate it when I say that there is probably no member of this House outside of the member who introduced this bill and the members of the Committee on Invalid Pensions who has any idea of the merits of that case. I have inquired amongst the members privately and in conversation with them, and I have failed to find that any other sentiment or condition than the one I have stated exists in this body so far as these bills considered on occasions like the present are concerned.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. That question is this: This bill has been on the Calendar nearly two weeks. The report has been also on file for the same length of time. Now, why has not the gentleman referred to the report for the purpose of getting information?

Mr. RUSSELL. I will come to that in a moment. As my time is limited, I hope I will not be interrupted any oftener than the members think necessary. I make the proposition, and I think I can substantiate it by the facts, that there has been no time for the consideration of this or any other bill on this Calendar by the members of the House who were disposed to devote a proper portion of their time to the business of a public nature before this body.

Here are the facts, Mr. Chairman. The House Calendar for the 5th day of this month shows that there was then upon this Calendar 54 bills of this nature. The House Calendar distributed among the membership for the 7th of January shows that number had increased to 116, or an increase of 62 bills. The House Calendar put upon the desks of members to-day shows that there are now upon the Calendar 144 bills, or an increase of 28 since the 7th, or a total increase since the 5th of January of 90 bills. Now, I submit that no member of this body who devotes any time whatever to the investigation of the large and important subjects which come before it would have any time to devote to the investigation of these bills upon the Private Calendar. I have been told by members that these matters were committed to the Committee on Invalid Pensions and that their judgment was accepted by the membership of the House without any question whatever.

I want to say, sir, that I have no reason on earth to doubt the diligence and the honesty and the integrity of any member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The fact that they were assigned to that service by the distinguished Speaker of this House is a guaranty to me that they are honest and intelligent and just; but, sir, as an evidence of the fact that they can not have sufficient time to devote to these measures I desire to call attention to some remarks made upon this floor on the 23d day of May, 1902, by the distinguished Representative from the State of California [Mr. LOUD]. I read a portion of what he said on that occasion:

> Pension legislation, to my mind, has become a disgrace to this legislative body. During this session of Congress we have, on eight days, passed 1,169 pension bills, probably not exceeding twenty hours having been spent to pass 1,169 bills. Most of these cases have been examined by the Pension Bureau very carefully, by a body that we constitute, that have used deliberation with all the means at their command and have rejected them. They come to Congress.
> Now, what is the routine? Let us be fair with ourselves and frank with the country. Representative Smith or Jones is entitled to so many bills. He goes to the member to whom his bills are referred, and I think I am speaking correctly of what is actually done, and says: "I wish you would report that bill." I think in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred that bill is reported, and the man himself selects the bill which shall be reported; and without desiring to criticise particularly the Committee on Invalid Pensions, let us see how it works there. A member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions introduces a bill. He refers it to himself. He orders a report made. It goes upon the Calendar. It has there in front of it or back of it 100 or 150 other bills.
> The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole works as if he was working for a thousand dollars a minute [laughter] and speaks as fast as he can; the Clerk begins, the perspiration showing in his face, and his actions show that he feels that "We have got this day and we must get through as many as we can," and the bill is passed; and one member of Congress and no more knows the merits or demerits of that bill.

When the distinguished member from California, who is also a distinguished member of the Republican party, announced this doctrine here, the House good-naturedly joined in and assented to it by laughter, as shown in this RECORD. I have in my hand the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, filed in the year 1902, and that report shows that the Senate committee adopted certain rules which are embraced in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, and therefore to that extent indorsed by him. I read as follows:

> The Pension Committees of the two Houses of Congress were created to consider a limited number of claims, some of which were necessarily rejected by the Bureau of Pensions for the reason that they were not covered by any existing law, while others were rejected upon legal or medical technicalities, which Congress could properly set aside as a matter of equity and justice. It was not the intention to have Congress flooded with pension bills, but simply to afford a means of relief in cases of exceptional merit. Unfortunately the primary and essential purpose of these committees has been lost sight of, and there seems to be a prevalent opinion that it is proper to bring every rejected claim, either for original pension or increase, to the attention of Congress, and in many instances the Bureau of Pensions is being entirely ignored.

I submit, sir, that that language from the appendix to this report clearly corroborates and indorses the position announced on the floor of this House by the distinguished Representative from California [Mr. LOUD].

In addition to that, sir—and I will hurry forward—as showing that the Committee on Invalid Pensions has not the time, nor has this House any time properly to consider these measures, I refer to the fact that since 1861 there have been passed by the Congress of the United States 9,286 private pension bills, and of that number at the last session of this Congress there were passed 1,114, or more than one-ninth of them.

To restate the proposition, eight-ninths of the amount I have mentioned were passed in forty years, while one-ninth of them were passed at one session of this Congress.

Let me call attention, in this connection, Mr. Chairman, to the rapid increase in these private pension bills. In the year 1898 there were passed 394 private pension bills, that carried $67,014. In the year 1899 there were passed 300 bills, carrying $45,186. In the year 1900 there were passed 684 private pension bills, carrying $117,759. In the year 1901, 707 of these acts, carrying $120,192, while in the year 1902 there were passed 1,114 of these private pension bills, carrying $182,825.

This, Mr. Chairman, exhibits the rapid increase and growth of this evil in the House, where these bills are passed without consideration, and necessarily so, because the time of members is completely absorbed in the consideration of weightier and more important matters.

Now, sir, we have a Pension Bureau. We have general pension laws. The Pension Bureau has in its employ 2,173 persons; and to support and sustain it there was expended last year the sum of $3,590,529.12.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I have made no assault upon any just pension measure, nor do I propose to do so where the measure is just and there has been time for the members of the House to consider it, but I submit that if the general pension laws of the Government are unjust they should be amended. If the force in the Department is insufficient, it should be increased. But as long as we have the Pension Bureau, as long as it is so admirably and so expensively equipped and maintained, this is not the body where measures ought to be passed without debate and without consideration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. It is a common practice in this body, when a bill is introduced that relates in its subject-matter to some department of the Government, to refer that bill to that department and get a report from it before the bill is acted upon. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think it would be a good practice, before the committee reports any private bill, either for original pension or increase, that the bill should be first submitted to the Bureau for a report from the Commissioner of Pensions as to whether adequate relief can be afforded by existing laws before this body acts upon the bill?

Mr. RUSSELL. I think so. I think the evil, as I stated in the outset, exists in the attempt to rush through the House measures which the members individually can not possibly have time to consider and make up their judgment about, when at the same time they are required under the rules to vote upon each measure. For these reasons, sir, I object to the bill just read.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. RUSSELL] is echoing a speech made in 1892. He is not discussing the bill before the House. He has not suggested a single objection to that particular bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, I desire to correct his statement in this particular: He said 1892. It was 1902.

Mr. LACEY. I understood the gentleman to say 1892.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; you did.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am told by my colleague that I said 1892. I meant 1902.

Mr. LACEY. Well, let us talk about 1902, then. Since 1861, he informs us, there have been 9,000 private pension bills passed.

Mr. RUSSELL. Since 1861 there have been more than 9,000.

Mr. LACEY. Very well, in forty-one years, with a million of soldiers' names upon the roll——

Mr. MADDOX. Two and a half million.

Mr. LACEY. A million of soldiers who are living to-day——

Mr. MADDOX. Two million and a half.

Mr. LACEY. No; there are a million soldiers' names on the roll. With over two million or nearly three million enlistments there have been in forty-one years only 9,000 private pension bills passed. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the fact that nearly all the Revolutionary soldiers were put upon the roll by private bills, a private bill for each of them, or for a large group in one bill. The custom of passing private pension bills is as old as the Government itself. I think when he calls our attention to the fact that 9,000 of these bills have been passed in forty-one years, that he illustrates the moderation in which the Congress has dealt with this subject. He forgets, Mr. Chairman, that the soldiers of the war of 1861 now average considerably over 60 years of age. He forgets that the exigencies of particular cases growing out of age and infirmity take many of them entirely beyond the reach of the general law. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MADDOX. I want to ask the gentleman this question. He said all the Revolutionary soldiers were pensioned by private bills. Did we have any Pension Bureau then with all these laws that we now have?

Mr. LACEY. We did not have a Bureau in the beginning.

Mr. MADDOX. Then we had to have private bills?

Mr. LACEY. An attempt was made in the first instance to dispose of all these cases by Congress on the individual merits of each case. That was found impossible. You will find thousands of these beneficiaries named by special bills in the early part of the nineteenth century. Then laws have been passed since then by which this country has attempted to settle these matters under general laws. But general laws can not cover all cases. And let me give an illustration of one case placed on the Calendar a day or two ago. A man who is in absolute poverty and destitution is drawing a pension of $12 a month under the act of June 27, 1890. He is supported by the county in which he lives as a pauper; he is cared for by a nurse; he is provided for as an utterly helpless man.

Now, the question comes up in the form of a private pension bill before this Congress as to whether relief will be given to this man. He is now 75 or 76 years of age. It is utterly impossible for him to prove that his present condition is due to Army service. In fact, it is not wholly due to the service, but mainly due to his advanced age. He appeals to Congress, and states that the pension of $12 per month is an utterly inadequate sum to support him, and he is supported as a pauper from the treasury of the county in which he lives. The Committee on Invalid Pensions examined the case, and understanding that while he would be entitled to $72 a month under existing laws if he could prove service origin of his disabilities, that, that being impossible, they make an exception in his favor and place him on the roll at $30 a month. Now, this is the character of the cases reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that he does not answer the point made by the gentleman from Texas. The point is this: We have a Commissioner and a Bureau for the consideration of these cases. The gentleman says that these claims passed on in this House in this way are claims which have been rejected by the Bureau; and he wants to know why, if we have a Commissioner and have a Bureau and we pursue the laws made by Congress on this subject—why can not the friends of pensioners rest there and not multiply these cases before this House? I want to hear the gentleman on that point.

Mr. LACEY. I have certainly not made myself intelligible to my friend from Georgia. I was explaining that the Commissioner of Pensions, in a case like the one that I have described, can not grant a pension beyond $12 a month.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Why have it at all?

Mr. LACEY. I was explaining the matter in a particular case, and the thoroughly helpless condition of the man who is supported in the county in which he lives as a pauper; and we know that it is not the desire of Congress to have men on the pension rolls become a charge as paupers in the county in which they live.

Let me make further answer to my friend from Georgia. Under the rules of the Committee on Invalid Pensions they take up and consider no case where the Commissioner of Pensions can give relief. They only take up those cases where by reason of the universality of the law he can not grant relief. Where the law can not provide for a particular case and the peculiar exigencies of a particular case the Pension Committees recommend relief. These are the only cases that they attempt to pass upon, and that is the basis on which we have the organization of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions of this House and the Committee on Pensions in the Senate.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman to admit that it is a fact that the pension bills passed here are passed outside of the law, without law, and could not be enacted in any other way?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly, not outside of the law, but outside of the general law. We make the laws for each particular case, just as after the Revolutionary war Congress made a law for every case brought before them. Congress in the first place acted as Commissioner of Pensions; Congress passed a law applicable to each particular case. Later on general laws were passed, but still many private bills were acted upon.

Now there are too many cases to follow that original method, and yet it is impossible to frame a law that will fit each particular case. We have the case of a soldier who has lost his sight, perhaps, through Army service, and he can not prove it. It was forty years ago, and he is unable by adequate evidence to connect the blindness and helplessness of the present time with the service in the Army. The Committee on Pensions consider it, look at it like a court of equity, and say this man ought to have a pension. They take up the cases and consider them in that spirit. And when the gentleman says that 9,000 bills have been passed in over forty years, it only shows the great care and patience and good sense of the committees that have handled the cases of this kind.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman allow me another interruption?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentleman says that this pensioner can not convince the Commissioner that he is entitled to a pension, how can he convince the committee of this House?

Mr. LACEY. Certain fixed rules of law must be established for the presentation of these cases in the Pension Bureau. A high order of evidence is necessarily required to establish the facts, and soldiers are often unable to furnish the evidence which would be required in a court of law or by the Commissioner of Pensions. In such a case the strict technicalities of the law are waived by these committees, and this class of cases considered upon their merits, and on somewhat different principles, more as a court of equity would consider them than under the strict rules of a court of law.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I want to say that the gentleman from Iowa perverts and misconstrues the argument of my colleague with respect to the number of bills passed in forty-one years. He shows the number of bills that passed, and shows that many of them in the early consideration were carefully considered, but that 10 per cent had passed in one session of Congress.

Mr. LACEY. I am glad my friend from Texas has made this suggestion; it is worthy of an answer. If the argument has any force or effect at all, it is to the effect that in late years the proportion of pensions granted by and approved by Congress has improperly increased. That is the objection, as I understand, that he makes. Let me say that in the last forty-one years 41 years of age has been added to the burden upon the shoulders of these veterans of the war of 1861. Many of these cases brought before the House are cases where the pensioner dies before he receives the benefit of the bill, caused by his advanced age. I know a number of instances of this kind where the pension bill has become a law, but before the heart of the pensioner has been gladdened by the reception of the certificate he has gone down into his honored grave.

So, Mr. Chairman, it is certainly natural that the cases where the facts require great attention on the part of the committee must increase, and will no doubt continue to increase for the next few years, until the last of these old soldiers have been taken care of.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. RUSSELL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa this question. He has stated the fact that since the war, since 1861, there have been passed 9,296 private pension bills.

Mr. LACEY. I have accepted the statement of that fact made by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is correct. The gentleman asserts that these figures demonstrate that this body has been careful in considering the passage of the bills. Now, according to these figures, 8,882 bills were passed in forty-one years and 1,114 bills were passed in one session of Congress. If the number passed in forty-one years is a demonstration as to the conservatism of this body, what does the number of 1,114 demonstrate that were passed in one session of Congress?

Mr. LACEY. That question does not acquire any additional force by being asked the second time. I have tried to explain that the increased infirmities of age in these cases have necessarily become more numerous, and they will become still more numerous in the future. You will find that a large per cent of the cases presented now from day to day are cases where men have passed long beyond the seventieth milestone of human life and who can not be very long the recipients of the bounty of the Government. The liberality of Congress with these men will be justified by the fact that they have but few years yet to live.

It is simply smoothing the way of these old men into honored graves. And I am surprised that the gentleman from Texas should give note to his recent advent in this House by reviving the old and time-worn—yes, the utterly threadbare—attacks upon the pensions of the Union soldiers. He will find that this straw was thrashed out long ago by his predecessors. He will glean no grain from that.

I remember when another distinguished gentleman from Texas organized himself into a bureau of obstruction on this question; but finally his good nature would not permit him to follow that course any longer, and he voluntarily retired from the attitude that he had assumed. And we have had other men who have taken up this subject, but they have not long persevered in their work.

But if the gentleman wants to do any good in relation to pensions, let him take the bill and the report in a particular case and show wherein that bill is wrong. He has not pointed out any objection, either valid or otherwise, to the particular bill now pending before this committee, nor to any other bill; but he has simply indulged in the assumption that because the number of pension bills has increased as time has elapsed that therefore there must be something wrong in the increased number of reports on the part of the Pension Committees.

I am not a member of those committees; but I have in past years served upon one of them. I know the thankless labor, I know the nights of weary work that they have to spend in going over these difficult private bills, and I know the care with which members endeavor to weigh each individual case. It is a burden more than any man's shoulders ought to bear; and yet, Mr. Chairman, it is one of those things that necessarily must arise from time to time as the years go by, and these increasing burdens of the disabled veterans call for some additional allowance upon the part of the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, the time that is allotted to the consideration of these bills is limited. We have had to-day a speech on the one side and on the other upon the general subject of pensions, which under the rules could not have been indulged in. I simply want to give notice that hereafter I shall insist that if gentlemen want to speak they shall talk to the bill. There is ample time when the appropriation bills are up. Anybody desiring to speak on the general subject of pensions can have then all the time he wants. I feel that it is my duty as a representative of the committee to make that suggestion. I hope gentlemen will not occupy further time in this way.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a very meritorious bill. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RUSSELL] said he did not know anything about it, and finally he said that he made no opposition to it, if I understood him correctly—though when there was so much confusion I may have misunderstood him. The proposed beneficiary of this bill was wounded at the battle of Chickamauga, and carries in his body a bullet which has so affected his spine that his present condition is such that he can neither get up nor lie down. He is absolutely helpless, and requires constantly an attendant or assistant to move him from his bed to his chair, or from his chair to his bed and to feed him. If it were conceded that this grievous disability was of service origin, he would be entitled under the general law to a pension of $72 a month. I say that, on the evidence, I have not the slightest doubt—and I think that not a member of this House, with the evidence before him, would say that there is a particle of doubt—that this man's condition to-day is the result of wounds received in battle.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question with reference to this particular bill?

Mr. SULLOWAY. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Since this discussion began I have read the report; and what I wish to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire is this: If the disability from which this man is suffering has arisen by reason of wounds received in battle, how is it that he can not get at the Pension Bureau an increase upon his $24 a month? If he is entitled to such an increase—and I must say, from the hurried investigation I have been able to give to the facts as reported by the committee, that he seems to be entitled—how is it that he can not get it at the place where the Government has directed he shall first apply? Why is it that he has had to appeal to Congress for this increased pension? That is what I want to know.

Mr. SULLOWAY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. I shall be pleased to answer if I can do so.

Mr. SULLOWAY. The gentleman is a practicing attorney?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; I have tried my hand at it.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Then I ask the gentleman whether he has ever tried a case in which the court ruled against him and he appealed from the ruling?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Well, this case has been to the Pension Bureau, and the Bureau has refused the increase. An appeal has been brought to Congress, and this committee is unanimously of the opinion that this man's claim ought to have been allowed at $72 a month; but we have decided to compromise the matter, not giving him the entire $72 which he should have, but giving him $50.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand that, but I do not understand that this House of Representatives is a board of review or a court of review of the Pension Bureau.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Well, it happens to be, whether the gentleman so understands it or not.

Mr. BARTLETT. All right, then; if it be true, as the gentleman states, then the pensioner and the present beneficiary of this bill has not obtained what he was entitled to at the hands of the Pension Bureau.

Mr. SULLOWAY. That is what I say, in my judgment, on my honor as a man and a member of this House.

Mr. BARTLETT. Well, it is a very singular state of affairs.

Mr. SULLOWAY. And he will not get what he is entitled to if this bill passes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] recalled just now some ancient history. He says that the Revolutionary soldiers were all pensioned by special act. I have here a copy of the act under which they were pensioned, being "An act to provide for persons who were disabled by known wounds received in the Revolutionary war, 1806." There are others previous to and since that providing that the applicant must be a man incapable of earning a living by manual labor to be eligible to draw a pension.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Is the gentleman speaking to this bill or discussing the subject generally?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Tennessee to proceed in order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I was doing my best to correct some not exactly disorder, but some incorrect bits of history stated by my friend from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], and here is a statute——

Mr. LACEY rose.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a word, and I have done.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Here is the statute of 1806, in fact, carried away down to 1844 or later.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. Has the gentleman looked through the long list of special acts, where, in some cases, two or three hundred pensioners were in a single bill, covering the early statutes of the century?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have seen a few of them; yes. But here is a general law carried down—amendments as late as or after Polk's Administration, and clear on down until those laws were repealed by what is known as the civil war statutes—so that the gentleman is entirely mistaken when he says that there was no such thing as a general law for Revolutionary or other soldiers until recent years.

And I want to say there, Mr. Chairman, that they did not pension millionaires under these statutes; that they limited it to a man who was unable to earn a livelihood by manual labor. The very words of the statute so provides. For example, to quote, "the applicant must become and continue disabled in such manner as to render him unable to procure subsistence by manual labor." Mr. Chairman, he also had to make an oath that he not only did not have any property, but that he had not disposed of his property so that he might get the benefit of the pension.

Again, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] the other day very kindly referred me to "history" on this subject that I might be corrected—in other words, that I had not stated correctly; that the applicant for a pension must be incapable of earning a livelihood by manual labor before he was pensionable under our old laws.

Mr. Chairman, I have just a word or two more to say—that I had already read this "history," I would say to my friend from Ohio and was familiar with it, and I quoted in my speech almost literally the very words I have to-day read from these old laws.

Here is an opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States in 1832, in which he says, my dear sirs, that if the party is already on the pension roll and afterwards becomes rich that he is no longer pensionable. I will read the syllabus:

If after a person is placed on the pension roll——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield a minute? It will save him a great deal of trouble if he will turn to the RECORD of the day before yesterday. There he will discover that I referred only to the pension legislation in regard to the pensioners of the civil war, and twice repeated it so as to make no mistake.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will read exactly the gentleman's words, because he knows I do not want to misstate him. The gentleman misquoted me on yesterday and the RECORD shows that I was correct.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. He has built a straw man and is knocking it down.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will get the language and read it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Or refer me to the page. I had the RECORD here a moment ago, but can not find it just now. I will read what I started to read when I was interrupted, and then I will ask my friend to read from the RECORD what he asked me to read. The Attorney-General of the United States in 1832 said—I read the syllabus:

If after a person is placed on the pension roll he acquires so much property that he no longer needs the assistance of his country for support, the foundation on which the pension is given falls, and he may be dropped from the rolls.

Thus spoke Attorney-General Taney.

Mr. Chairman, here is another opinion from William Wirt, the Attorney-General of the United States, delivered at an early day, in which he says in reference to this oath to which I alluded a few moments ago, wherein the applicant says he had not fraudulently disposed of his property in order to get a pension:

That it was the intention of Congress to make the amount of the schedule the test of the indigence of the applicant, and that consequently the relief given by the former act is to be continued in every case in which the schedule shall exhibit proof of such indigence and that the income of the property is inadequate to the support of the applicant.

I will read more at length from the opinion of the Attorney-General in 1832. He said:

The law was designed for the relief of those who were at any time in actual want. If after a person is placed on the pension roll he acquires so much property that he no longer needs the assistance of his country for support, the foundation upon which the pension is given fails, and therefore any one who does not need it for his support may, I think, at any time be dropped from the roll.

If a different construction is put upon the laws of 1818 and 1820, a person who by descent or devise or in any other way had become wealthy and affluent might be receiving the bounty of the public, when it is evidently intended for no one but persons who have no other sufficient means of support.

I have cited this old law and authorities, gentlemen, to show how far we have wandered away from the track of the fathers by passing laws here to pension millionaires and people who were capable of supporting themselves.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I care nothing whatever about the effort of the gentleman to substantiate his position of a few days ago, except as he attempts to make it appear that I made a statement of a fact in regard to the statute of my country that was not true. Against that attack of his I come with determination to let him understand once and for all that he can not dodge and quibble behind a proposition such as he has attempted to bring here now. There was no discussion about the question of the Revolutionary pensions. There was no discussion about the question of the pensions of the Mexican war. And I will read now to the House and show to the House how utterly shameless it is to attempt to impeach me with a false statement, by reading a statute and a decision made under laws that I had no reference to whatever.

We were discussing a question growing out of the increase of pensions from $35 to $40 a month for deafness in our own service, and my language could not be misunderstood by anybody who was disposed to treat me fairly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Have I not asked my friend to read from the RECORD, so that I would state it correctly?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman has gone to work and made a speech, assuming a condition that did not exist, and then asks me to read from the RECORD, and then to publish his speech, as having achieved a wonderful attack and a successful contradiction of what I had said. Now, let me read what I said. I read from page 546 of the RECORD:

Mr. Speaker, one of the important considerations which has always been involved in the passage of general legislation touching the subject of pensions has been to steer clear, as far as possible, of the very proposition suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] and which he seems to advocate.

Not many years ago it was attempted in this House to pass a bill to provide pensions for indigent soldiers of the civil war, and that proposition was denounced from one end of this country to the other. No opposition was more unanimous or could have been than that to a bill which undertook to place as one of the conditions of the relief to be afforded by the act of Congress the proof of the applicant that he was in needy circumstances. And when we passed the act of 1890, from that day to this a large body of soldiers throughout the country have been taught to believe that that was also a "pauper-pension bill," and the indignation of the people of the country was poured out upon that measure until it was discovered that there was no condition of poverty or necessity or indigence that was carried or referred to in any way in the provisions of that law.

Mr. Speaker, it has been the purpose, steadily adhered to by Congress, never to compel a man who has fought for his country and incurred physical disability to be compelled to expose to the Government or its officers the fact that he was in needy circumstances. Sometimes we have urged that as a matter in support of a private pension bill when the law seemed inadequate, but never in all our history have we incorporated into a measure conferring a pension upon a wounded soldier or a disabled soldier the necessity of making known that he was also a pauper. I refer, of course, to legislation relating to the great civil war.

I advise the gentleman from Tennessee, in all kindness, to study the history of this legislation.

Not legislation about the Revolutionary pensioners, not the legislation about the Indian wars, but this legislation, the legislation with regard to the great civil war; and I repeated later on in the remarks that I made that I was talking solely and only about the great body of pension legislation that related to the civil war. And I said then, and I say now, that there are no gentlemen on either side of this House will rise in their places and say that we have ever incorporated in a bill to pension a Union soldier a provision that he should prove that he was indigent and a pauper. No gentleman on the Democratic side of this House, whether he was a soldier of the North or a gallant soldier of the South, has ever sought to put such a condition as that into a pension bill, at least since I have been a member of this House, and never has it been made a condition precedent to the successful prosecution of a pension claim. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, it was not my good fortune to be present in the House when this tempest was started. I was detained a moment over in the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee. But I realize that one of the reports of the Committee on Invalid Pensions must necessarily be the matter of discussion. I feel like all of that committee's reports are susceptible of defense. Report No. 2834 shows that this soldier served his country from September 15, 1861, to December 15, 1864. The records of the Pension Office show that—

As early as 1892 the examining surgeons found a ventral hernia, and gave it as their opinion that the bullet which produced gunshot wound of the back, which was never extracted, and which could be easily felt——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee (continuing). If my friend will yield, and I hope he will. I am informed the gentleman from Ohio, in the course of his remarks——

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Oh, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Said I made a false statement. If the gentleman will allow me, I want to know if that is true?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I believe a question of personal privilege is higher than any other question in this House. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will yield to me for a moment.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. How much time do you want?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a few minutes.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will wait. I see the gentleman from Ohio is out of the Chamber. I do not know where the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] is. I will wait until he returns.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Then wait until he returns, and I will yield to you.

Mr. MADDOX. Send for him.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. When the gentleman returns I will yield.

I will continue reading the report where I was interrupted:

Which was never extracted, and which could be easily felt and found beneath the insiform appendix, had produced a rupture of the abdominal wall and of the stomach.

Here is a soldier who had three years' service, who was wounded three times in battle. Let us see what his condition is, following in the report:

Gunshot wound of back:

Ball entered 3 inches to the left of the spinal column and lodged 2 inches below the sternum and is encysted under the fascia. Muscles at entrance are atrophied and contracted. This gunshot wound is a very bad one. The stomach trouble is due to the gunshot wound of back by causing an atrophy of the same. The stomach is reduced in size one-eighth. The ball seems to press against the anterior wall of the stomach and is the source of constant irritation. Part of the nerve supply which supplies the stomach is destroyed. This produces a spinal irritation. He has irregular breathing, dyspnœa, and hiccough, produced by an irritated diaphragm from the pressure of the ball. The heart's action is irregular and rapid, neck and shoulders painful, and abdomen and thorax constricted, and there are local areas of hyperthesia of the skin, legs, and back, and the muscles tremble all the time in the arms and abdomen.

Has articular and muscular rheumatism. All joints are invaded, enlarged, red, painful, and swollen. Muscles and tendons are atrophied and the ridge joints anchylosed. Elbows are partially anchylosed; ankles and knees are swollen and tender, painful and anchylosed; joints of wrists, knees, and ankles are stiffened; muscles of legs are atrophied and contracted, and tendons contracted; can not stand upon legs at all; legs are drawn and they are the same as no legs. Has to stay in bed except when helped from a cot to a chair. Can not use feet or hands, and he is so disabled from double inguinal hernia, ventral hernia, rheumatism, heart and stomach trouble as to require the regular aid and attendance of another person.

Proof filed in the Pension Bureau shows that the beneficiary has no income or means of support except the pension of $24 per month; that he can not feed himself or dress or undress himself or attend to the calls of nature, and has to be cleansed and washed as a baby; that he has not walked since 1897, etc.

In the opinion of your committee the ventral hernia and the spinal trouble are due to the severe wound of the back described by the examining surgeons, and inasmuch as the soldier is shown to be in such a condition that he requires the aid and attendance of another person and is in destitute circumstances, and that he can not even feed or dress or undress himself, relief to the extent sought for in the bill seems warranted, and the bill is therefore reported back with the recommendation that it pass.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I make the point of order that we can not hear what is said.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will request all gentlemen to cease conversation, and gentlemen in the aisles will please take their seats.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I am speaking from the record and I do not desire to go beyond the record. Three years' service, three times wounded in battle, to-day, as described by the records of the Pension Department, this soldier is unable to stand on his feet by reason of the injury received, not since 1865, but by injury received in battle. He lies not only in bed, unable to move, but he is unable to attend to the common wants of nature. His friends have nursed him these many years, but unable to nurse him back to health, but unfortunately the Bureau has seen fit to say that for this service he shall only receive $24.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman right there?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. As to this particular bill, because I have read the report in this case, I would like the gentleman from Indiana, who is a member of this committee, to tell me if he does not think the statement contained in the report as to the condition of this soldier, and the causes of it, entitles him to receive at the hands of the Pension Bureau this increase without coming to Congress?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Why is it, if he is entitled to receive it from the Bureau under the law, and I take it that under the law he was justly entitled to receive more pension, why was it he did not get it and had to come to Congress to secure that which he is entitled to under the law?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Of course I can not speak for the motives that exist in the Pension Department, but I agree with the gentleman from Georgia that, outside of the action of the Department, I believe it ought to have granted him a pension of $50. I rise here for the purpose of saying that I am in favor of this bill and its passage in the next five minutes, because I believe this man is entitled to it under the law; and for one when I find one of these old patriots where I believe he is entitled to it under the law I shall not be content to say that he shall be turned back to the Department that has wronged him, either purposely or by mistake in judgment.

I believe to thus treat this soldier with three years' service, and the record shows that he has to be waited upon like a child, would send the blush of shame not only to the members of this House, but to every American patriot did he know the actual condition of this soldier; and if the blame is with the Department I believe that the time will come when that Department over there may not only be criticised when wrong on the floor of this House, on this side of the House, but the other side of the House as well, and not only on the other side of the House, but in the country at large. We have increased the pension of the totally deaf of service origin, also of the maimed, and the country demands a more definite and liberal pension to the country's defenders, and I hope next session of Congress will so amend the pension laws as to insure better pensions.

I believe in this case there is a wrong done in the Pension Department. As a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I joined in this report because I believed it. I do not believe that the time of this House should be taken in settling a controversy between the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Tennessee. No longer ago than yesterday one of the gentlemen for whom I made a report, Captain White, passed beyond, and if this soldier and a few more are to be left behind let these gentlemen consume the time.

So I would suggest to the gentlemen of this House that whenever the Committee on Invalid Pensions make a report that will not bear scrutinity, one that does not present a case that is both patriotic and founded in justice, then let us scrutinize that report and turn it down. But in this case, where we have a soldier who gave three years and three months, who gave his life, almost, from wounds in two battles, and who for many years has been confined to his bed by reason of actual injuries received, I say for one I am not only willing to stand by the old soldier, but I am willing to stand by the record which this committee has made and challenge successful attack.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. What reason does the Bureau give for not having acted favorably upon this man's case?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. The general and usual reason that $24 is commensurate for the injury received according to the present examination.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask the gentleman if his committee has evidence in addition to that which was before the Bureau.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. How does the gentleman know that the Bureau with the additional evidence would not act favorably upon it?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. The evidence that the committee had, if there was nothing else than that, would show to this House that in that particular case a great injustice had been done to this man. I know my good friend from Tennessee—in the case of this old soldier, who can not last but a short time, who is helpless and forced to have friends wait on him as they would a babe—I know my friend would not send him back to the Department, where his death would be likely to follow while he was waiting for justice. Here we are not only lawmakers, but judges of the situation, and let us take these cases and do justice to these soldiers, as we do to other American citizens. That I ask, if nothing more. Let us get down to business. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of personal privilege, and I regret very much to have to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. In the course of his remarks, a stenographic report of which I have, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], a few moments ago, uses this language:

Mr. Chairman, I care nothing whatever about the effort of the gentleman to substantiate his position of a few days ago, except as he attempts to make it appear that I made a statement of a fact in regard to the statute of my country that was not true. Against that attack of his I come with determination to let him understand once and for all that he can not dodge and quibble behind a proposition such as he has attempted to bring here now. There was no discussion about the question of the Revolutionary pensions. There was no discussion about the question of the pensions of the Mexican war. And I will read now to the House and show to the House how utterly shameless it is to attempt to impeach me with a false statement, by reading a statute and a decision made under laws that I had no reference to whatever.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that this reflects upon me, and without justification. The gentleman, after thus speaking, reads from the RECORD to show that my arraignment of him was unjustifiable and "shameless." He reads his speech found in the RECORD on page 546, of January 6, 1903. He now states that there was no reference whatever to our wars previous to the civil war in this debate, January 6. I will not take up the time of the House to read exactly the words used by the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, let us see exactly what I said in my speech of January 6, in which I denounced the bill which allowed millionaires to become pensioners upon this Government. Let us see what I said and what I had in mind, and what the gentleman had in his mind when he undertook to reply, and then we will see whether what I said is "shameless" or not. I said:

Mr. Speaker, the bill states that on and after the passage of this act all persons on the pension rolls of the United States, or who may hereafter be placed thereon, shall receive this rate of pension. "All persons;" no limit. Sir, that "person" may be worth a million dollars, and under this law he can be pensioned. "All," not certain persons, but "all" who have served in our Army or Navy. That was never intended to be the policy of our pension law. Our old pension law, Mr. Speaker, read something like this, "unable to make a living, unable to support oneself because of military or naval service." I hope the bill is not open to the criticism that I have made.

Now, then, the gentleman from Ohio took the floor to reply to my remarks, and here is his language at the very opening of his speech:

Mr. Speaker, one of the important considerations which has always been involved in the passage of general legislation touching the subject of pensions has been to steer clear, as far as possible, of the very proposition suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] and which he seems to advocate.

Again, at the bottom of page 546, he said:

Mr. Speaker, it has been the purpose, steadily and adhered to by Congress, never to compel a man who has fought for his country and incurred physical disabilities to be compelled to expose to the Government or its officers the fact that he was in needy circumstances.

"Never" is a long time. The Government has "never" done so and so.

Now, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that I was not talking about the late civil war, and that the gentleman at the very beginning of his speech replied to my language about our "old pension laws." I submit that I quoted almost literally from the old pension laws that I had in mind, and with which I am familiar, when I used this language January 6:

Unable to make a living, unable to support oneself because of military or naval service.

Here is the pension act passed in 1843 or 1856, incorporating statutes that applied to the Revolutionary soldiers, and I will now read section 4, applying to the Revolutionary soldiers. It applies to any man or officer clear down to the humblest man "enlisted in the service" in the Revolutionary war.

Such persons had to come within this limitation to be pensioned, to wit, those "who in consequence of known wounds received aforesaid has at any period since become and continued disabled in such a manner as to render him unable to procure subsistence by manual labor."

In section 5 it says the affidavit must show "the nature of such disability, and in what degree it prevents the claimant from obtaining his subsistence."

Again, over on the next page, in section 8, we find this:

Every invalid making application for this purpose shall be examined by two reputable physicians or surgeons, to be authorized by commission from the judge of the district where such invalid resides, who shall report in writing on oath or affirmation their opinion of the nature of the applicant's disability, and in what degree it prevents him from obtaining subsistence by manual labor.

And so on through, with even stronger language, and which I substantially quoted when I said that no man under the old laws who was able to maintain himself was within the letter or spirit of these laws.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I turn to a book which contains the pension laws of the United States, second edition, and its author is George W. Raff, of Ohio. On the very first page we find he says, in speaking of our old pension laws:

Invalid pensions are grants of money to persons who become disabled in the service, either by wounds or other injuries received, or by sickness contracted in the line of duty, whereby the sufferer is rendered incapable, in whole or in part, of procuring for himself, or those dependent upon him, a livelihood.

I read a few moments ago the act of 1806, containing almost the identical language that I have read. I will not take up the time of the committee to read that again.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me go a step further and see whether or not my criticism of the gentleman's criticism of me is "shameless" or not, whether or not I, here in the great American Congress, got up willfully and deliberately and criticised in a "shameless" way a member of this House, and particularly one very far my senior both in years and in experience in this House.

Here is the oath, Mr. Chairman, construed by the then Attorney-General, William Wirt, whose opinion I read a few moments ago:

I, A. B., do solemnly swear or affirm (as the case may be) that I was a resident citizen of the United States on the 18th day of March, 1818, and that I have not since that time, by gift, sale, or in any manner whatever, disposed of my property, or any part thereof, with intent thereby so to diminish it or to bring myself within the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war," passed on the 18th day of March, 1818; and that I have not, nor has any person in trust for me, any property or securities, contracts or debt, due to me—

I hope gentlemen will give special attention to this—nor have I any income other than what is contained in the schedule hereto annexed and by me subscribed; nor until such persons shall have delivered or caused to be delivered to the Secretary of War a copy of the aforesaid schedule and oath or affirmation certified by the clerk of the court to which the said schedule was delivered, together with the opinion of said court, also certified by their clerk, of the value of the property contained in the said schedule: Now, provided that in every case in which the pensioner may be insane or incapable of taking an oath, the court may receive the said schedule without the aforesaid affirmation from the committee or other person authorized to take care of such person.

Even the insane who were rich were not pensionable.

The opinion of Mr. William Wirt, as Attorney-General, construing this oath is thus referred to in Brightly's Digest, page 742, that I am reading from:

It was the intention of Congress to make the amount of the schedule the test of the indigence of the applicant. (1 Opinions of Attorneys-General, p. 356.)

"Indigence," if you please.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I turn again to the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States, delivered in 1832, which I read in full:

OFFICE OF ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
March 22, 1832.

SIR: There is no express provision authorizing you to strike from the roll of pensions a person who was continued on the list after the exhibition of his schedule and who has since acquired property enough to support him without the assistance of his country. Yet the pension is obviously intended for those only who have not other sufficient means of support.

By the original law of March 18, 1818, it is not given merely to the persons who were at that time in need of assistance from their country for support, by reason of their reduced circumstances, but to those also to whom the like misfortune might afterwards happen. It was designed for the relief of those who were at any time in actual want.

If, after a person is placed on the pension roll, he acquires so much property that he no longer "needs the assistance of his country for support," the foundation on which the pension is given fails, and, therefore, anyone who does not need it for his support may, I think, at any time be dropped from the roll.

If a different construction is put upon the laws of 1818 and 1820, a person who, by descent or devise or any other way, had become wealthy and affluent might be receiving the bounty of the public, when it is evidently intended for none but persons who have no other sufficient means of support.

R. B. TANEY.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

Attorney-General Clifford held:

A lieutenant, otherwise entitled to a pension, is not entitled to receive it while on duty and in receipt of pay as an officer of the Navy; nor can he receive it while not on duty but in receipt of the pay allowed to his grade.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I had these old laws that I have been reading from in mind when I used the language quoted in my speech. I had no other laws in mind. My language proves this: "Our old pension laws read something like this." Then the gentleman, replying to my proposition, used, January 6, as I repeat, this language:

I advise the gentleman from Tennessee, in all kindness, to study the history of this legislation.

And again the gentleman says:

Mr. Speaker, one of the important considerations which has always—

"Always," mind you—going even further back than I did, for I did not allude to the Continental laws (I was not familiar with them), which were more rigid than those of later years. But he says:

Mr. Speaker, one of the important considerations which has always been involved in the passage of general legislation upon the subject of pensions has been to steer clear, as far as possible, of the very proposition suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, and which he seems to advocate.

So, Mr. Chairman, we find that the gentleman said that the policy of the law had "always" been to avoid the very thing that I was talking about and to steer clear of the very thing that I was talking about, thus making the position I took indefensible, as it were, and my statement of history incorrect, unsupported, and indefensible.

Now, the gentleman goes still further back in ancient history—further than I went:

Mr. Speaker, it has been the purpose, steadily adhered to by Congress, never to compel a man—who had fought for his country and incurred physical disability to expose to the Government or its officers the fact that he was in needy circumstances.

"Never," in no case, under no circumstances—

Mr. Chairman, I have thus read the opinions of the Attorneys-General; I have read the statute; and I submit again to this House whether or not I did substantially quote, January 6, the "history" of our country touching upon "our old pension laws," which I was discussing, and which the gentleman led me to believe he was discussing, and which he certainly did discuss.

I will leave it to the House and to the country to see whether or not I have made a "shameless" statement of history or whether or not the distinguished gentleman has made a "shameless" statement or misstatement of history.

Mr. Chairman, I submit in all candor that I was courteous to the gentleman, for when I submitted myself to an interruption from the gentleman from Ohio, cordially and willingly, I invited him to take the RECORD and find his exact remarks. I took the RECORD myself here and tried to find his remarks, but as my time, brief, as you know, was running rapidly I wanted to go on with my speech, and in my usual, I hope, cordial way, I asked the gentleman to open the RECORD and read his language so I could get it exact. The report of the debate shows that. I will not repeat it here.

Now, I submit that I not only substantially quoted the gentleman's language, Mr. Chairman, but I say that I have stated the pension history of my country under our old laws substantially on the point in question; I have stated the substance of the opinions of great officers of the Government on these laws; I have taken the statutes here and read them in the presence of this great body of lawmakers, and have clearly shown I was on June 6 correct, and am to-day, in my contentions, and that the gentleman from Ohio was not correct, and that his statement of history was "shameless" and not mine.

The gentleman from Ohio became angry in the premises and leveled his guns at me, and says that he serves on me for to-day and hereafter a notice that I shall not do so and so. I will say to him that as long as I am a member of this House I shall defend my rights as a member, but at all times I will respect the gray hairs of the distinguished gentleman, although he may never see even now or hereafter that he has done me or himself, in this matter, an injustice.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I owe an apology to the House and to my country for having been the innocent cause of the suspension of the public business for the length of time that we have endured this suspension. I congratulate the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] that he has had an opportunity to speak without limit of time and has made one of the best speeches of his life, the best part of it being the speech which I had the honor to deliver two or three days ago, and which he has incorporated very fully into his own speech. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Taking the whole matter together, the House understands exactly what the issue was, and I do not propose to repeat it. The whole instance reminds me of an event which happened many years ago, when the hair of the gentleman from Tennessee was not quite so gray as mine is now. It was at a time when we used to visit, as a great event in social life, the Mammoth Cave in Kentucky. It was a wonderful place, and there was a little hotel there, and a very ingenious hotel keeper had adopted a plan of having all of his patrons, in addition to the indorsement of their names upon the register, write something of a poetical or other character expressive of their views of the Mammoth Cave.

There was one gentleman there who was not very highly developed in the art of writing poetry, but who possessed some skill in making a good point at the right time. He was urged to write something. He said he was not capable of the occasion, but upon being urged very greatly finally wrote these words, which came to my mind in the progress of this wonderful debate:

Oh, Mammoth Cave, what a spot!
In summer cold, in winter hot.
Great God Almighty, what a wonder!

And he stopped there. Some one said, "You must fill that out." He wracked his brains and finally wrote:

Andrew Jackson, hell and thunder!

[Applause and laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman may be able to get Andrew Jackson into a hole—he is dead and gone; but he can not get me into one.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken and the amendment agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Alfred J. Sellers."

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment:

In line 10 strike out "thirty" and insert "fifty."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 10 strike out "thirty" and insert "fifty."

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, if the House will bear with me for one minute I will state why I offer this amendment, and I do not think the committee will object.

In the first place, in the ten years that I have been in Congress I do not think I have ever made such a motion before, and I therefore ask this consideration at your hands.

Next, the evidence is undisputed that Colonel Sellers has been paralyzed; that he has been in the hospital for months, and that he is obliged to have an attendant. Were this disability of service origin he would be entitled to $72 a month.

His claim has the support of the Grand Army by resolution, and I have a petition here, signed by Republicans and Democrats prominent in my district, interested in military affairs, certifying that he is totally disabled, and that he is absolutely without means. I have the affidavit of his physician that he is attending him as an object of charity, so to speak. This case should appeal to the judgment of this House that this man should have $50 a month. He is 67 years of age. It can not run for long. He had a most brilliant record. He won the medal of honor at Gettysburg, and everything that can be said in favor of a man's service to his country and his utter incapability of taking care of himself is embodied in the matter that I lay before you. I appeal to the sense of justice of the House. I am not asking the $72 provided by law for total disability. I am only asking that the sum allowed by the committee, $30, be raised to $50; and I hope that the House, in its judgment, will sustain this amendment.

Mr. DEEMER. On the part of the committee, I accept the amendment.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I heartily agree with all that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said with reference to the bravery and reference to the present condition of the soldier. For one I would be glad to see him have $50. If his condition was of service origin he would be entitled to $72. But I remind this House that the Committee on Invalid Pensions has passed on this case. It has passed upon it in light of the action of the House heretofore as well as that of the committee. That is on this proposition. The soldier notwithstanding his bravery, if he did not receive the injury while in the line of service, has no pensionable standing at the Department under the general law. The committee adopted that rule that if in the condition that this honorable soldier was, notwithstanding he could only get $12 at the Department, where he was helpless, where he was in the condition that he required the attendance of another, we would give him $30. This is a pretty good increase over the general law.

The rule has been invariable. That rule has governed the committee. That rule thus far has governed this committee. This soldier, like hundreds of others, has been turned down by the Committee on Invalid Pensions approved by this House; but if this House in its liberality is willing to say that the Committee on Invalid Pensions has not been liberal enough with these honorable soldiers with a good record who, like thousands of others, can only receive $12 at the Department and have been given $30; if you say we shall make it $50, and that is the policy of the House and of the committee, I have no objection. But one law must apply in this House to all of a given class. It is unfair to turn down yesterday a soldier who has as honorable a record as this one—aye, in a condition as deplorable as this one—and say we will only give him $30, and then as a matter of sentiment say we will give this one $50. Without any reference to his condition being different from the other, but with reference to other soldiers with just as good a record and other soldiers in just as deplorable condition, I want to know of this House, now, if you are going to turn down the committee, if you are going to establish another rule, if you are going to say to this committee that has been criticised for overliberality—if you are going to say that they have not been liberal enough in giving increases and give an increase in this instance to $50? If so I want you to go back to the committee room with me and I will show you not one, but fifty others that the committee has declined to give $50.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of this House, when we have a general law that confines an honorably discharged soldier whose disability is not of service origin to $12 at yonder Department by reason of the general law—when we come, as we have been doing, and increasing that law, not by amendment of law, but by special act, to $30, I think gentlemen will judge, possibly from every standpoint, we were subject to criticism. Still, we were not caring for that. But in establishing the rule and stating, if the soldier was dependent, was helpless, if he required the aid of an attendant, we, as the lawmakers, would make it $30, we then discriminate in his favor $18. If you make $50 for this one, we must change not only the rule of the committee, but the rule of this House, and say that we have not only raised this soldier's pension and made this up to $30, but beyond all that the House raises it to $50.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, in the interest of this Friday set apart for the purpose of rendering a little aid to the old soldiers, we should not now throw a barrier in the way and take this case up and make it another exception and make it $50. If you are going to stand by the committee, you will not only have this opportunity to do so on a motion to increase, but also on a motion to cut down, when it would be a little narrow to do so. Without any reference to this case, with due regard to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania and his interests in this matter, I insist—aye, more, I demand—in the interest of the old soldier, I demand in the interest of the system that will permit us to put bills through, that you do not treat even this honorable soldier different from the treatment you have been rendering others. Therefore I hope that the gentleman's motion will be voted down.

Mr. ADAMS. In reply to the gentleman from Indiana, I would say that, from the standpoint of the committeeman, his position is well taken. It may be necessary for the committee to lay down a general rule that when certain members come to them, however much the committee may think of the justice of the case presented, however much it may appeal to their sympathy and patriotism, it is necessary to have some rule upon which they can fall back and say no; but this House is not limited by the rule of the committee. All legislation from every committee is brought in here and submitted to the judgment of this House. This case is now in the House, and it is for the House to say whether this appeal to their judgment should be granted. I ask, in the language of the gentleman of the committee who has just sat down, I demand that the soldier who fought for his country shall not be allowed to spend his last days as a pauper, dependent upon friends and neighbors. I ask, and I demand, for a man who has a wound of service origin, and who in the course of nature has become stricken with paralysis and lies at a public hospital, dependent upon his friends and neighbors, with the affidavit of his physician on file here to that effect—I ask that the House make this increase for this man who on the field of honor was wounded and who on the field of battle won a medal of honor. This House should respond to the appeal that he be not left in his old age, at 67 years, a pauper in a public hospital, attended by physicians and dependent on his friends and neighbors for support. Thirty dollars will not let that man live and have the attendance of some one to take care of him.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I heartily approve of all the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said. If it were possible to prevent any old soldier, or all old soldiers, from going to the poorhouse, from languishing, from the want of any of the necessaries of earth, I would be willing to give it to him, but he must concede that in this case this condition is not of service origin. This great Republic through this body has said, and the law was criticised at the time——

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. The gentleman does not wish to make a mistake. This applicant is pensioned, and $12 of his present pension is for service origin, a gunshot wound at the battle of Gettysburg.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Yes; and that is the extent of his disability, but he has other disabilities that make him require the attendance of another. We have passed a law that says that all of these applicants shall receive $12. The committee has recommended from time to time, notwithstanding that general law, when we found a soldier in this condition, that we give him $30. The question which I wanted to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania was whether there was anything different in this case from hundreds of others that have been turned down. There is nothing, and he is now recommended for $18 above others of his class. The gentleman from Pennsylvania should be content.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ADAMS) there were—ayes 31, noes 40.

So the amendment was lost.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ANNIE E. DOSS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 15673) granting a pension to Annie E. Doss.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Annie E. Doss, widow of Sylvester Doss, alias Harry S. Doss, late pilot of the ram Lancaster, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 7, after the word "Lancaster," insert the words "Mississippi Marine Brigade."

In line 8 strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eight."

Mr. SHATTUC. I ask that the report in this case be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

This bill proposes to pension Annie E. Doss, widow of Sylvester Doss, alias Harry S. Doss, late a pilot on the ram Lancaster, at $30 per month.

The husband of this beneficiary served as a steersman, assistant pilot, and pilot on the rams Queen of the West and Lancaster, of the Mississippi Marine Brigade, from May 1 to November 19, 1862, on the New Era from January 6, 1863, to May 26, 1863, and on the Lexington to May 27, 1863.

He was a pensioner under the general law at $15 per month on account of injury to right shoulder and ihp and for disease of gums, with loss of teeth, incurred while serving as pilot on the ram Lancaster, and by virtue of a special act of Congress approved June 5, 1900, his pension was increased to $30 per month upon the ground that his disabilities of accepted service origin entitled him to that rating.

He died April 20, 1902, from overexertion and exhaustion while swimming from the steamer City of Pittsburg.

The claim of Annie E. Doss, the beneficiary named in the bill, who is now 63 years of age, as the widow of the former pensioner, filed under the provisions of the act of June 27, 1890, was rejected on July 2, 1902, upon the ground that title to pension under said act could not obtain for the reason that pilots of the Mississippi Marine Brigade were not mustered into the military or naval service of the United States, and hence did not come within the provisions of the act of June 27, 1890.

Proof filed in the Pension Bureau shows that the beneficiary married Mr. Doss on July 6, 1863, that he died as stated above, and that the only property assessed to her was a house and lot in Cincinnati, Ohio, of the value of $650.

From a statement of the beneficiary on file in the Pension Bureau it appears that this property is mortgaged at $250, and that she is dependent upon her daily labor for support.

Congress has repeatedly held that the second paragraph of section 4693, Revised Statutes, should not only apply to the general law, but also to the act of June 27, 1890.

Following such holding, your committee believe that the beneficiary is entitled to the rate of pension provided to widows under the act of June 27, 1890, namely, $8 per month.

The bill is therefore reported back with the recommendation that it pass after the same shall have been amended as follows:

In line 7, after the word "Lancaster," insert the words "Mississippi Marine Brigade."

In line 8 strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eight."

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out "eight" and inserting "twelve," so as to make the amount of this pension $12 a month. I can say that the committee, or the gentleman who drew the report, will not object to this amendment.

As stated in the report, Mr. Doss was a pilot during the war and suffered in the manner stated in the report. This House—I think in 1900—gave him a pension, by special bill I introduced, of $30. Last fall he was with his son, also a pilot, on an excursion going down the river upon the steamer City of Pittsburg. Down below Evansville, if I remember rightly, when an accident happened to the steamer, he put on his life-saver in the middle of the night and was found dead on the beach the next morning. Very near him was the body of another passenger, an old lady, whom he had undoubtedly been trying to save from drowning.

The widow of this man has no means of support except the pension which the Government may pay here, and I do hope that this committee will give her enough to pay her house rent. I trust the amendment will prevail.

Mr. SULLOWAY. This beneficiary has no standing at the Pension Bureau under the law, for the reason that the brigade in which this man served was not mustered. He was pensioned at the rate of $30, the circumstances showing him to be, I may say, "a total wreck." The only question in the present posture of the case is whether he died as the result of the injuries for which he was pensioned. If so, this lady would be entitled to a pension of $12 a month; at least, that is what the committee would allow her—putting her on a level with other widows in similar condition.

She married this man during the war—I think in 1863. She is extremely poor, or at least has very little property—two or three hundred dollars, I think, which is in a home. It is for gentlemen here to say whether they will allow her $8 or $12. They will not do any injustice if they give her $12; but as there is no evidence that this man's death was the result of injuries of service origin, we have reported in favor of granting this lady a pension of $8.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, this case, like the one disposed of a few moments ago, must be governed by some rule, or else we can have no standing here, either as a Committee on Invalid Pensions or as a Committee of the Whole. That this is a worthy widow, that her husband rendered honorable service, I do not question. She is poor and needy. But we have undertaken to establish a rule that where the injury is not of service origin the pension be fixed at $8, and that where the injury is of service origin $12 be allowed. No soldier's widow, however honorable may have been the service of the soldier or however deplorable the condition of the widow, can go to the Pension Office and receive more than $8 a month unless she shows that her husband died of injuries received or disease incurred in the service.

Now, Mr. Chairman, all over this land there are thousands of worthy widows who can get only $8 a month. This good woman is not entitled to anything under the law; but the committee, in view of the honorable service of her husband and in view of her condition, has said that it will allow to her, as it does to others similarly circumstanced, a pension of $8. We have done this not only during this Congress, but in the Fifty-sixth and the Fifty-fifth as well. Would it be fair to say to this woman who has no pensionable standing that we will give her $12 a month and cut off numberless others who are just as worthy with $8 a month?

I am willing to clasp hands with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC] in amending the general law so as to give this lady and all such as she $12 a month; but while we are under the present law, which entitles her to nothing, and we have adopted a rule that to all such as the Congress will allow $8, I am opposed to making "flesh of one and fish of another." I would either make all these pensions $12 or all $8. We have established a rule in the committee making the pension for widows of this class $8. If the committee's rule is to count for nothing and is to be stricken down, then I warn the gentleman from Ohio, one of the friends not only of this widow, but of all soldiers and all soldiers' widows, that if the general rule is not to apply, but we are to discuss each case on its merits upon the floor of the House, we shall thereby place an obstruction in the way of pension legislation so that there can be very little relief afforded to these old soldiers or their widows.

I believe that, in the interest of the soldiers and their widows, as well as in the interest of uniform legislation, we ought to stand by the report of the committee and allow to this widow of a soldier just what we have allowed all others of the same class—no more and no less.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the chairman of the Pensions Committee said to me that it would be committing no violence to the rules to have this bill passed with the amendment I have offered. I would also call attention to the fact that the chairman of the subcommittee who reported the bill told me there was no objection, even under the rules of the committee, to having the bill passed as I ask it to be amended. I would further call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MIERS] to the fact that this man (the husband) did die indirectly from wounds of service origin, from the fact that he contracted such disease or diseases in the service that he was unable to take care of himself in the water at the burning of this steamer, and the fact that he did do what he did in his feeble condition, trying to save the life of a lady, ought to have some bearing. I may say to the gentleman from Indiana, who all the time is pleading the cause of the old soldier, that he ought not to object, for here is a woman whose husband never in his life voted the Republican ticket except when he voted for myself, and then he said he had to stimulate to enable him to do it. [Laughter.]

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that if there ever was a claim in this world which is more meritorious, this is. I speak advisedly, because I know the "princess"—he always used to call his wife "the princess"—and if she were my own sister or my own mother I could not do any more for her than I would be willing to do for her. It is all very well for the gentleman to talk in the way he does, because he is expected to do it, in a way, being on that committee. I do not think that he believes a word that he says, as applying to this claim. He is talking for his committee, to sustain a rule. He would, if he was not expected to represent the committee, vote himself for my amendment, because when I went to him and asked him about this he did not tell me he was going to oppose it. I know, in the goodness of his heart, after having made his speech, he will now sit down and keep still and let the bill pass with my amendment. I will ask the gentleman if he will do it?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. No.

Mr. SHATTUC. Then I will say that the gentleman ought to do it, and if I were as great a man as he is I would not vote against this old Cincinnati lady, now that he has had an opportunity of expressing the views which he has done.

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Chairman, ordinarily I believe in standing by the committee, but I believe this is a special case where we would be justified in supporting the amendment. I know the beneficiary mentioned in this bill and I knew her husband. I knew her husband and I know also that he rendered a most distinguished service, a service which in its character was specially and extra hazardous. I remember as a boy reading the thrilling account of the running of the blockade in front of Vicksburg, and the man who stood at the wheel of the Lancaster—he was the pilot at that time—was the husband of this lady. I remember that around the bulkhead of that vessel there were piled bales of hay for the purpose of protecting the soldiers who were there. These bales of hay took fire. That fire was communicated to the vessel and while on fire it floated by the city of Vicksburg. The guns of the enemy were trained upon her.

Mr. Doss, the husband of this woman, stood at the wheel, with the fire and the smoke hurling around him, and remained at his post until the vessel blew to pieces. He was thrown into the river and finally rescued. I remember when he came home he was received with honor in the city of Cincinnati. He was a poor man, unable to do but little service during the remainder of his life, and the case of this widow appeals to me and appeals to others as scarcely any other case could. I therefore trust that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC] will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

In line 8 strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the bill as amended will be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. WARNOCK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make the amount $50.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the order laying the bill aside will be vacated.

Mr. WARNOCK. I want the amount raised to $50 instead of $30, and I desire to amend by inserting the word "fifty" instead of "thirty," so that it will read $50, and in behalf of that amendment I would just like a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio the object he seeks will be reached by voting down the amendment, the original proposition in the bill being for $50.

Mr. WARNOCK. That is what I desire. That is the inquiry I desired to make, whether an amendment had been reported by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the amount, $30, is the committee amendment.

Mr. WARNOCK. And the question now is upon that amendment. Then, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to that amendment for the following reasons: I am very well aware that the rule of the committee has been and is, where the disability is not shown to be of service origin, to limit the amount of pension to $30. But in this case I think it is a very fair one to present to the House for a different ruling. We claim that this disability is of service origin. The soldier during the war contracted a catarrhal trouble which finally culminated in such a disability that the Pension Department itself allowed him a pension of $24 a month. The medical board of examiners who examined him found that in addition this catarrhal trouble had produced total blindness. If this total blindness was the result of catarrhal trouble, he would have been entitled to $72 a month.

The medical board sitting in Washington, who never saw the soldier, who never examined him, sitting in their office, report that total blindness is not and can not be the result of catarrhal trouble. They differ from the report of the medical board of the county where the soldier lives. They differ from many medical authorities with whom I have consulted in regard to the fact that total blindness may result from catarrhal trouble. So that in this case it is not a question as to whether this is a disability of service origin solely; because if it were admitted that it was not of service origin, then the rule of the committee would apply. As I understand the rule of the committee, it is not that the amount shall be limited to $30 if the disability be of service origin, but if you can show it to be of service origin it may be a greater sum.

Bills have been passed here this afternoon where the pension allowed was $50 per month. So if I am correctly stating the position of the committee, it is as I have indicated; that is, $30 a month where it can not be shown to be of service origin. Now, in this case we claim that it is of service origin. We claim that the medical board of the county where the soldier resides declared it to be of service origin, and we declare it to be shown by medical testimony to be of service origin. As against this proposition this House has solely the ruling of the medical board sitting here in the city of Washington, who never saw the soldier. It is one of the causes of complaint of the administration of the Pension Department to-day that the medical board sitting in the city of Washington, without seeing the soldier, overrules without hesitation the report of the local board.

That is one of the matters I think ought to be remedied by some different rule of the board, or by specific legislation. It has worked out an injury and an injustice to at least ten different soldiers within my Congressional district within the last two years; men that I have seen and talked with and know how the local board has rated them and what they have considered. But they have assumed to adopt certain rules at the Pension Department in adjudicating pension claims which defeat the action of the local boards. Gentlemen on the other side of the House have asked questions by which it is sought to show that there have been improper rulings and improper administration in the Pension Department. I agree and say that I think there have been improper rulings upon many subjects in the administration of affairs in the Pension Department.

Now, in this case, it is a question about which there is controversy as to whether or not the disability is of service origin, the testimony of the physicians at home being that it is of service origin, and the only opposition to that being that of the medical board in the city of Washington, who say that total blindness can not be produced by catarrhal troubles. I have a letter from ex-Governor Foster, of Ohio, stating that this man is a neighbor of his and that he knows him well, and he speaks of his total blindness as being the result of affliction and disability which he incurred in the service. I say this state of facts does not warrant the committee in cutting it down from $50 to $30. He is an old, blind, helpless soldier, and a man unable to take care of himself, a man that is poor, without friends to help him, and I say that this old, blind, helpless man should be given a pension of $50. He is only granted $24 by the Department; he is cut out of the $72 class, as I have said, by the medical board in Washington deciding that blindness can not be the result of catarrhal trouble.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, this beneficiary was discharged in 1865. He had a good service. He is pensioned, not at $24, but $17 per month, as the report shows. His blindness, so far as there was any evidence before the committee, is not claimed to be of service origin. It came on within a year or two, as I understand it, and is caused by cataracts. We have allowed the beneficiary exactly what we have allowed all claimants in similar condition. Besides that, this House amended a Senate bill fixing these rates when it was not of service origin, if they were blind and helpless and paralyzed in these respects so they had to have assistance—we amended the Senate bill, granting to them $30 to relieve this legislation of one by one. We have granted him exactly what we have given others under similar circumstances; and if we wish to be consistent the committee amendment ought to obtain, and I hope for that reason that it will.

Mr. WARNOCK. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SULLOWAY. Certainly.

Mr. WARNOCK. If the gentleman was satisfied that the catarrhal trouble produced this blindness and that the catarrhal trouble had been contracted in the service, would that change the gentleman's ruling?

Mr. SULLOWAY. If the difficulty was of service origin it certainly would.

Mr. WARNOCK. That is what we claim precisely.

Mr. SULLOWAY. But you have no evidence of it.

Mr. WARNOCK. You have the evidence from the local board and a letter from ex-Governor Foster, all of which go to show that it is of service origin.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I do not know whether Governor Foster is a physician or not; I know that he is a very distinguished citizen, but there was no evidence before the committee that reported this bill of anything of that kind. It is simply the case of where a man came out of the service in 1865 with disabilities for which he was pensioned at the rate of $17. In 1886 or 1888 this condition came on.

Mr. MADDOX. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WARNOCK. Certainly.

Mr. MADDOX. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the gentleman is drawing a pension by reason of a catarrhal affection which he contracted during the war?

Mr. WARNOCK. Yes.

Mr. MADDOX. The local board of physicians say that by reason of that disease he has become blind?

Mr. WARNOCK. Yes.

Mr. MADDOX. And the board in the city of Washington say that that is impossible?

Mr. WARNOCK. That is the situation.

Mr. MADDOX. Does the gentleman know the local board of physicians?

Mr. WARNOCK. No. This applicant resides in the city of Fostoria and that is in the three Congressional districts.

Mr. MADDOX. It seems to me that this is a very important question. If the general board sitting here in Washington undertakes to say that a man can not become blind by reason of catarrhal affection, while the local board says that he can, and that this man actually did become blind from that cause, then we ought to know the real facts and, if the circumstances demand it, get another general board.

Mr. WARNOCK. I understand that the board here in Washington has ruled that blindness can not in any case be the result of catarrhal trouble. They rejected this man's claim for a pension at the rate of $72 on that ground, and on that ground alone, as I am informed.

Mr. MADDOX. It would seem that the doctors ought to have some positive knowledge on this subject; and if this general board is mistaken about this matter, then its members are incompetent, and others ought to be appointed.

Mr. WARNOCK. One of the complaints that I have against the board here in Washington is that they have improperly ruled that a great many things can not occur as the result of certain diseases when they have in fact occurred.

Mr. MADDOX. This man is evidently blind, is he?

Mr. WARNOCK. Totally blind and helpless.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I have anything further to say on this matter. Our boards are perfectly honorable and honest, composed of gentlemen of education and good standing. If they certify that this man has become blind on account of catarrhal trouble, I should not doubt it, although I have very serious doubt whether very many men have become blind from that cause. But so far as this case is concerned, I can only testify that in my opinion the board in my district is composed of honorable, efficient, and thoroughly educated gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the committee reducing the amount of the proposed pension from $50 to $30.

The question having been taken,

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. WARNOCK. I call for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 43, noes 7.

JUDSON N. POLLARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1300) granting a pension to Judson N. Pollard.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Judson N. Pollard, late of Company B, One hundred and fortieth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and scout and spy, United States Army, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I want to appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, if he will give me his attention, and to the committee to increase this man's pension from $20 a month to $30 a month. The reasons are these: This man is identically in the same condition that the rule of the committee seems to sanction as to granting pensions at $30 per month. The bill was introduced inadvertently in the Senate at $20 per month. It was allowed in full by the Senate and came over to the House. Had the bill been introduced in the House, and the House committee had passed upon it as they have on other bills, they would, I think, have allowed it at $30 per month.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have had before this committee cases of as extreme suffering as that presented in the claim advocated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I have believed that the committee was right in establishing a rule, and having that rule adhered to, of paying $30 a month in cases of total disability, and I have not asked for an increase in those cases, although in one instance, as I remember, a man had been confined to bed for two years by paralysis and was without any means of livelihood except charity.

But in the present case this man is totally blind. He called upon me before I came to Washington in December. He was led by his wife—totally helpless. On account of a paralytic stroke he can not walk without a cane nor without the assistance of his wife. He needs her attention day and night. It seems to me that this case ought to be governed by the same rule that the committee has held in the cases of persons needing the assistance of another person day and night. If this had been a House bill, I have no doubt that such an allowance would have been made. But as this was a Senate bill, and as it had been through inadvertence introduced at less than the proper and usual amount, the committee ought to consent that this pension be made $30 instead of $20, thus carrying out in effect the rule of the committee instead of making an exception to it.

Mr. Chairman, I move that in line nine the word "twenty" be struck out and "thirty" inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, upon a hasty examination of this report, which was prepared by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON] as a subcommittee, I find that the beneficiary served less than ninety days. Therefore he had no standing at the Pension Bureau; and he made no claim for disabilities contracted in the service. The report states that he is in the bad condition described by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH]. As the gentleman from Tennessee reported this bill, I would like to hear his suggestions about it, if he has any to make.

Mr. SHAFROTH. One word in answer to the statement just made by the gentleman from New Hampshire. This beneficiary was only 13 years old when he enlisted. He served for ninety days and was discharged because he was a boy. But he was determined to remain in the Army; so, after coming back home, he returned to the Army. He was under the care and personal supervision of General Thomas, who sent him upon several very dangerous expeditions. One was to carry a note calling for reenforcements upon the eve of a certain battle, I think, near Nashville, Tenn. The general had tried to get into communication with the needed forces, but could not do so. Several men had been shot in the attempt. It was thought that a boy might get through where men had failed. He undertook the expedition and was successful in carrying the note. He was, however, shot at a number of times and received a wound in his leg during the trip. The horse that he rode was shot. But, as I have said, he got the note through and came back, and by reason of the reenforcements thus obtained (as the affidavit shows) the General was successful.

This boy remained in the service until the close of the war. He was called "the mascot" of General Thomas. He was around the General's headquarters and the General took a personal interest in him.

This boy having been fired with patriotism that produced such action on his part and such results to the Union, now that he is an old man, being absolutely helpless, it seems to me his case should be regarded as coming within the rule made by the committee allowing $30 to a person who has suffered such disabilities.

Mr. SULLOWAY. If it were shown that he rendered the service stated by the gentleman this would certainly be a very strong case. I should like to hear the views of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON] upon this question.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in the record to sustain the alleged service of the beneficiary in this bill except his own affidavit, not corroborated. It may be true or it may not be. The committee has adopted a rule not to act upon the unsupported affidavit of the beneficiary.

This bill was introduced in the Senate at $20. It passed the Senate at $20. Coming over to the House it was referred to me as a subcommittee. I saw no reason for any change in the bill. Under the circumstances, considering that this was the case of a boy who served but a few days and afterwards loafed around the headquarters several months—the "boy mascot," as he seems to have been called—I thought that $20 would be a proper allowance. This is $8 more than he could have received if he had served ninety days and been honorably discharged from the service of the United States.

He is $8 better off than he would have been entitled to if he had served four years in the Army, his disabilities not being of service origin. I think the Senate dealt liberally with him, and I think the House Invalid Pensions Committee has dealt with equal liberality under all the circumstances of the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The question was taken; and upon a division (demanded by Mr. SHAFROTH) there were—ayes 21, noes 26.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

New Mexico desires to assume the responsibilities of statehood. It is able to do so. Senator M. S. QUAY, Washington, D. C.:

Citizens here anxiously following progress of statehood bill. We favor omnibus bill without amendment. We consider that the report of Senator BEVERIDGE is entirely unfair to the citizens of New Mexico and absolutely inconsistent with the facts.

O. D. Warnock, chairman; J. C. Tucker; E. Prodo, county commissioner; W. K. Stalup, probate clerk; J. N. Jackson, treasurer; J. E. Edington, superintendent schools; E. F. Fleming, assessor; James Hunter, sheriff.

Mr. QUAY. I present certain resolutions of the Commercial Club of Albuquerque, N. Mex., which I desire to have read in connection with the accompanying papers, for the reason that they traverse part of the testimony taken by the Committee on Territories.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks that the papers which he sends to the desk relating to the statehood bill may be read. Is there objection?

Mr. QUAY. That is, the papers last presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers last presented. The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Whereas in his testimony before the Senate Committee on Territories, investigating conditions in New Mexico, Mr. F. H. Newell, hydrographer of the United States Geological Survey, stated that "the Rio Grande is dry for many months, on an average of one year in three, from White Rock Canyon south," and made many other statements of like character; and

"Whereas such statements are erroneous and misleading, and when made by an officer of the United States, under oath, will be very injurious to the interests of New Mexico, aside from the matter of statehood, if not publicly corrected; and

"Whereas it is shown by the figures of Mr. Newell's own department in his report of daily measurement, taken under his own supervision, through a series of five years, that the smallest volume of water flowing past White Rock Canyon in the Rio Grande during the said period of five years was 262 cubic feet per second, or a hundred and sixty-nine and one-half million gallons per day; and

"Whereas, by the sworn testimony of a large number of persons who have lived for many years in the valley of the Rio Grande, it appears that the river has never been known to be dry at White Rock Canyon, or for 50 miles below that point, and but two or three times at Albuquerque: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, By the Commercial Club of Albuquerque, an organization composed of the business and professional men of this city and other sections of New Mexico, that we do most earnestly protest against the dissemination by the United States Government of false and damaging statements regarding the natural resources of this Territory, whether made by officers of the Government or other persons; and

"Resolved, That such statements as that quoted above from the testimony of Mr. Newell, if permitted to go uncorrected, would seriously retard the development of this country by deterring people from coming here for the purpose of making homes or investing capital; and

"Resolved, That we hereby respectfully request the honorable Senate of the United States to make this protest and the accompanying affidavits a part of the public record, to be published as a correction of the erroneous and damaging statements above mentioned and as a matter of simple justice to the Territory of New Mexico and to its people."

I, the undersigned, secretary of the Commercial Club of Albuquerque, do hereby certify that at a meeting of the said Commercial Club, held at the clubrooms in the city of Albuquerque on the 6th day of January, A. D. 1903, the above and foregoing resolutions were adopted, and I further certify that the above and foregoing is a true and correct copy of the said resolutions as appears from the records of the said Commercial Club now in my office.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the said Commercial Club, this 8th day of January, A. D. 1903.

P. F. MCCANNA, Secretary.

Mr. QUAY. I desire also to have the accompanying affidavits read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the affidavits will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Testimony of Mr. Jesus M. Romero, taken before Mr. O. N. Marron, a notary public.

Q. How long have you lived in the Rio Grande Valley?
A. I have lived here all my life.
Q. How old are you?
A. I am 43 years o age.
Q. How many times hav you known the river to be dry at Albuquerque during your lifetime?
A. Three times.
Q. For how long a period during each time has it remained dry?
A. About a month each time.
Q. In other words, you have only known the river to be dry three times in the forty-three years at Albuquerque?
A. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, this does not appear to be an affidavit. It appears to be a deposition.

Mr. QUAY. It does not matter, Mr. President.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator desire that the depositions shall be read, or would it be sufficient for the Senator to state the point to which the depositions go? I see that they are voluminous. Otherwise, of course, in order that the Senate may understand the whole controversy, all the testimony on the subject might equally be read from the desk.

Mr. QUAY. I have already stated that I desire to have the testimony read; it does not matter whether they are affidavits or depositions; and the Senate, I understand, has given consent.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course, if the Senator desires to have them read, that can be done, but I submit it does make some difference whether they are depositions or affidavits, because an affidavit simply goes to the point in a few words, whereas a deposition is the examination of a witness in the form in which a witness is always examined.

I merely make the point. I have no objection to the Senator having the depositions read, but if this evidence is read it would entitle the committee at any time, or any member of it, or any member of the Senate, to have that testimony read from the desk also.

Mr. QUAY. I have no objection.

The Secretary resumed the reading, as follows:

Q. Mr. Romero, Mr. Newell states in answer to Senator PATTERSON that the river goes dry at Albuquerque one year out of three and remains dry from sixty days to six months. What is your opinion of this statement?
A. It is absolutely false.
Q. Is it not your experience that we have regular rainy seasons in New Mexico during the months of July and August?
A. I have only known a few years that we have missed it.
Q. Have you been cultivating land in New Mexico in the Rio Grande Valley?
A. I have been cultivating land ever since I was 10 years of age.
Q. And have you had any trouble for lack of water with the three years that you speak of?
A. No, sir.

JESUS ROMERO.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 8th day of January, 1903.
[SEAL.] O. N. MARRON, Notary Public.

Testimony of Mr. Benjamin Johnson, taken before Mr. O. N. Marron, a notary public.

Q. Mr. Johnson, how long have you lived in the Territory?
A. Twenty-four years.
Q. How much of that time have you lived in the Rio Grande Valley?
A. About seventeen years.
Q. What business have you been engaged in, Mr. Johnson?
A. I have been engaged in the hide and wool business and mining.
Q. You are then somewhat familiar with conditions pertaining to the flow of the Rio Grande River.
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Have you had occasion to cross it many times during the summer season?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. At about what point?
A. The Indian pueblo Cochiti, where the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad approaches the river.
Q. Have you ever known the river to be dry at that point?
A. No, sir.
Q. Was there always considerable flow of water at that time?
A. There was always plenty of water, and some portions of the year had to cross in a ferry boat.
Q. At the point where you crossed the Rio Grande River how far is it from the station at White Rock Canyon?
A. About 26 miles.
Q. Are you familiar with the grazing and agricultural lands of New Mexico?
A. I am more familiar with the grazing lands than the agricultural.

BEN JOHNSON.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 3d day of January, 1903.
[SEAL.] O. N. MARRON, Notary Public.

Testimony of Mr. S. Crollott, taken before Mr. O. N. Marron, a notary public.

Q. How old are you?
A. Forty-eight years of age.
Q. How long have you lived in the Rio Grande valley?
A. Forty-three years.
Q. What is your occupation at Albuquerque?
A. I am a carpenter by trade, also farming, and am at present justice of the peace for Albuquerque precinct.
Q. Have you read the testimony given by Mr. Newell before the Senate committee on the new statehood bill, particularly at the bottom of page 180?
A. I have.
Q. What have you to say to the statement that the Rio Grande is usually dry, except during flood time, at White Rock Canyon?
A. It is not so.
Q. How many times have you seen the Rio Grande dry at Corrales, 10 miles above Albuquerque?
A. I have never known it to be dry at Corrales, 10 miles above Albuquerque, where I have lived for eighteen years.

SEFERINO CROLLOTT.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 8th day of January, 1903.
[SEAL.] O. N. MARRON, Notary Public.

Testimony of Mr. E. S. Stover, taken before Mr. O. N. Marron, a notary public.

Q. Mr. Stover, how long have you lived in the Territory of New Mexico?
A. A little over twenty-six years.
Q. What places or public positions have you held since coming to the Territory?
A. I have been a member of the legislative council, and president, although not an instructor, of the University of New Mexico for about eight years, and am now a regent thereof. I was also president of the bureau of immigration for about eight years.
Q. You then feel qualified to answer some of the statements made by Mr. Newell before the new statehood Senatorial committee?
A. I am. I have traveled over the most of New Mexico and am personally familiar with the conditions existing.
Q. Did you read the testimony of Mr. Newell, recently taken before the subcommittee Senate on Territories, of which Mr. BEVERIDGE is chairman?
A. Yes, sir; I did.
Q. Where have you resided since living in New Mexico?
A. Twenty-two out of the twenty-six years I have resided in Old Albuquerque, and my place on the west is bounded by the Rio Grande River

Then you are familiar with the history of that river for the past twenty-six years?

A. Entirely so.

Q. Mr. Newell states that the normal condition of that river is dry during most of the irrigation season, 50 miles above Albuquerque. Do you believe this to be a correct statement?

A. I know it to be absolutely false.

Q. How many years have you known the river to be dry at Albuquerque?

A. Never to be entirely dry; it has been partially dry for three years adjoining my place in Old Albuquerque, but at no time so dry but what the holes in the river bed were full of fish.

Q. With the intense interest that you have in the public affairs of New Mexico since residing here, do you think it possible that Mr. Newell in his official position could have made many visits to the Territory without your knowledge?

A. I do not think so.

Q. You therefore question the statement made by him in answer to the questions by the chairman of the statehood committee.

A. Unquestionably I do. I personally know that many of them are misleading in the extreme, and some absolutely false. And if necessary I can produce the sworn affidavits of one thousand or more men who have lived in New Mexico for thirty years to substantiate my statement.

Q. Have you in any way investigated or have you any knowledge of the underflow of the Rio Grande.

A. When I first came to New Mexico, twenty-six years ago, I was a member of the firm of Stover & Co., general merchandise. We introduced the drive pump in New Mexico, and in the course of two, three, or four years we put down in the Rio Grande valley and on its tributaries fully one thousand of those drive pumps, and in no instance in the Rio Grande valley did we fail to secure water, and in most instances we could secure a liberal and inexhaustible supply by sinking our wells only 3 or 4 feet. About 1½ miles from the banks of the Rio Grande I established a fish pond sunk in the surface of the ground about 2½ feet, and at no time during the twenty-three years that I had that fish pond was there any in-flow of water except from the seepage from the river. There was at no time an insufficient supply of water for my carp and bass.

Q. Mr. Newell states substantially, on page 175, that all of the agricultural land where water can be readily brought, owned by the United States, that a man could make a living on, has been taken up or preempted. What do you think about that statement, Mr. Stover?

A. I think his statement in regard to the land is as misleading as those relative to the water in the Rio Grande. I personally know in both instances that the statement is incorrect.

Q. Mr. Newell stated that it was his impression that only about one-fourth of 1 per cent of the area of the Territory is irrigated, and that that was practically all that could be irrigated under the present conditions. Is it not a fact that while you were president of the bureau of immigration you collected statistics that showed that the water then in sight—1894—would irrigate 2,064,455 acres, and the agricultural and possibly irrigable by storage, 28,225,267 acres, and that you also satisfied yourself that the creek and river bottom lands of New Mexico afforded about 2,000,000 acres of easily irrigated land, of which about 800,000 is actually under ditch?

A. It is; and these were figures which were given us by our agents which we believed to be correct, and which I now believe to be correct.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I rise merely to state, since that is being read, that in form the question and the answer are rather free testimony.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, what is the order of business? I ask for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Petitions and memorials. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] presented certain telegrams, and asked that the telegrams might be printed without reading, which was not objected to. He then asked that the resolutions and the affidavits which he sent to the desk touching the statehood bill might be read, and there being no objection that was allowed, and the Secretary is now reading those affidavits.

The Secretary resumed the reading, as follows:

Q. Are you not also satisfied, Mr. Stover, that irrigated farms from 10 to 20 acres are sufficient to give support to a family?

A. I have farmed in the State of Maine and in Kansas, and I desire to state from personal knowledge that 10 acres of ground in New Mexico under irrigation will raise more than you can on 100 acres in the State of Maine or New Hampshire, where I am familiar with the conditions in those States. In addition, I would like to state as to Mr. Newell's statement that practically all of the lands in New Mexico belonging to the Government upon which a person could make a living, except by stock raising, I personally know that settlers are coming in almost daily and taking up Government lands, upon which they believe they can make a good living by raising various crops, judging from what old settlers in the vicinity have been doing for the past twenty or thirty years.

Q. Are you familiar with the average yield per acre of such crops, wheat, oats, barley, or buckwheat, in New Mexico, Kansas, or Colorado?

A. Yes, I am somewhat familiar.

Q. What is the average yield of wheat in New Mexico?

A. 16.8 in New Mexico; Kansas, 8.4 bushels; in Colorado, 13 bushels.

Q. Oats?

A. New Mexico, 29.2; Kansas, 18.1, and Colorado, 26.7.

Q. Barley?

A. New Mexico, 21.6; Kansas, 8.1.

Q. On what do you form that opinion?

A. From the report of the Agricultural Department of the United States, 1898.

E. S. STOVER.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 8th day of January, 1903.

[SEAL.] O. N. MARRON, Notary Public.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, sufficient of the depositions or affidavits, whichever they may be termed, have been read to indicate their general trend, and I will not insist upon any further reading. The other depositions are in the same vein with those already read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask that they be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. QUAY. I ask that they be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

There being no objection, the remaining papers were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Testimony of Mr. Linder Wats, taken before Mr. O. N. Marron, a notary public.

Q. How long have you lived in New Mexico, Mr. Wats?

A. About thirty years.

Q. And have you lived on the banks of the Rio Grande River?

A. I have lived here in Albuquerque fourteen years.

Q. Are you familiar with the conditions of the Rio Grande?

A. Yes, sir; I have been gardening and fruit raising in this valley for fourteen years.

Q. Have you ever been troubled for lack of water during those fourteen years?

A. For only a short period.

Q. About how long a period, Mr. Wats?

A. About a month.

Q. Mr. Wats, have you read the testimony of Mr. Newell before the Senate committee?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Mr. Newell therein states that the river is dry one year in three, and from sixty days to six months. What do you think of this statement?

A. I think it is absolutely false.

Q. In your fourteen years of residence at Albuquerque, Mr. Wats, which was the dryest year?

A. This last year, 1902.

Q. About how many acres have you cultivated?

A. Eight and a half acres.

Q. This being the worst year you have had, would you mind telling about what amount you derived from your eight and a half acres?

A. I have derived $1,545.50.

Q. Is it your opinion that more land could be brought under cultivation in this section with modern ditch system?

A. It can all be cultivated.

Q. About what proportion of arable land is at present under cultivation in the valley from Albuquerque 27 miles north?

A. About one-fourth.

LINDER WATS.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 8th day of January, 1903.

[SEAL.] O. N. MARRON, Notary Public.

Testimony of Mr. C. E. Bonsall, taken before Mr. O. N. Marron, a notary public.

Q. Mr. Bonsall, how long have you lived on the Rio Grande, New Mexico?

A. I have lived there since 1880.

Q. Has your business been such during that time that you were enabled to observe the condition of the river?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you read the testimony of Mr. Newell before the Senate Committee on Statehood, particularly on page 180?

A. I have.

Q. Mr. Newell stated that the river is usually dry below the White Rock Canyon, or where the Santa Fe road approaches the river. What have you to state in regard to that statement?

A. I have never known it to be dry but three times in the twenty-three years of my residence at Albuquerque, and then it was only partially so, and yet Albuquerque is 66 miles below the point where Mr. Newell's appointed officer took the measurements.

Q. Then, Mr. Bonsall, you mean to state that there was always some water in the river?

A. Yes, sir; there was always water pools, where the small fish remained alive.

Q. Have you read the statement of Mr. Newell, in answer to a question by the chairman of the new Statehood Committee, on page 175, relating to the arid lands in New Mexico, in which he says there is probably no area in the ownership of the United States on which a man could make a living except by cattle raising? You say you have read that?

A. I have.

Q. Has your business been such that you have had opportunities to examine the arid land and agricultural lands of New Mexico?

A. Yes, it has. I have been over a large portion of New Mexico.

Q. What have you to state relative to the statement of Mr. Newell on the bottom of page 175?

A. I certainly think that Mr. Newell could not have made such a statement from any personal observation, and that he had been greatly misinformed upon the subject. I personally know of thousands of acres in the Territory of New Mexico still remaining in the ownership of the United States Government that is capable of sustaining life by agricultural means.

Q. Is it not a fact, Mr. Bonsall, that there are a large number of settlers between the Cochiti and the Nacimiento Range of mountains raising yearly crops without irrigation?

A. Yes, sir. There are a large number of acres of the same kind of land with the same conditions between these same ranges. In this same vicinity, by order of the court, I was appointed a commissioner to examine the land grant containing approximately 99,000 acres, and I with my associate commissioners made a report claiming that one-fourth of this area, or 25,000 acres, was good agricultural land and could be cultivated without irrigation.

Q. Mr. Bonsall, what has been your business?

A. Mining, prospecting, stock raising, merchandising, and hotel business.

Q. Mr. Bonsall, in your prospecting trips what have you noticed agriculturally in the mountains of New Mexico?

A. I have noticed that on nearly all the mesas at an altitude above 7,500 feet crops could be raised three and four years out of every five from the natural precipitation.

C. E. BONSALL.

JOHN A. MASON.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1733) for the relief of John A. Mason, to report it favorably without amendment. I should like to have the bill considered at this time. It will not take a minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks for the present consideration of the bill he has just reported from the Committee on Finance. It will be read to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the accounts of John A. Mason, collector of internal revenue for the second collection district of New York, with the sum of $430,249.83½, being the value of internal-revenue stamps destroyed by fire at the office of said collector, No. 114 Nassau street, New York, N. Y., on the night of February 11, 1898.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not object. I wish simply to call the attention of the Committee on Finance to the fact that this bill is not in the form such bills heretofore have generally been written and reported. In these matters of crediting for stamps, etc., the rule has been to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to investigate and, if satisfied, then to give the allowance.

Mr. PLATT of New York. The Secretary of the Treasury has investigated and reported on it.

Mr. COCKRELL. And has recommended it?

Mr. PLATT of New York. He has recommended it.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY AND NAVAL RECORDS.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to submit a report on the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] December 2, 1902, directing the Committee on Printing to consider and report on the propriety of publishing the military and naval records of the war of 1812, of the Mexican War, and the military records of the several Indian wars, in the same general style as that of the Rebellion Records. I ask that the report be printed for the use of the Senate, and all the correspondence in relation to it I wish to have printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report and all the correspondence relating to it will be printed for the use of the Senate, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to inquire what was the action on the resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was simply an order to print. It is simply a report without any accompanying bill in response to the resolution, and it was ordered to be printed.

RECORDS OF VIRGINIA COMPANY OF LONDON.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. LODGE on the 5th instant, reported it without amendment, and was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I am instructed by the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico to submit to the Senate the report of the subcommittee of that committee on general conditions in Hawaii and ask that the same be printed and recommitted to the full committee.

I beg to state in this connection that the report of the subcommittee on all subjects except the labor question is unanimous. The subcommittee is divided in their recommendations in regard to the admission of Chinese field laborers into Hawaii.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon, from the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, in behalf of the subcommittee of that committee, makes a report which he asks may be printed and referred to the committee.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask that it may be recommitted to the full committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

PRICES OF COAL IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. STEWART. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer, from time to time as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on the investigation into the price of coal in the District of Columbia and have the same printed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate. Said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest an amendment by inserting the words "and to compel the attendance of witnesses."

Mr. STEWART. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada modifies his resolution by accepting the amendment suggested by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. The resolution will necessarily go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. That portion of the resolution in regard to the employment of a stenographer may be stricken out, so that it will not be necessary for the resolution to be referred. It is important to have the resolution passed at once.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will feel obliged to rule that the resolution must go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The provision for the employment of a stenographer without any statement in the resolution that he shall be paid from the contingent expenses of the Senate would require a reference of the resolution.

Mr. STEWART. Then I will leave out the clause providing for the payment of a stenographer, so as to give the committee the power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to compel the attendance of witnesses. We shall have another resolution for the employment of a stenographer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How does the Senator propose that the payment of the expenses in connection with the summoning of witnesses, etc., shall be defrayed?

Mr. STEWART. I will inquire if there is any member of the Committee on Contingent Expenses present in the Chamber representing that committee, who can give assurance that the resolution will be considered to-day without delay?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] is a member of that committee.

Mr. STEWART. Very well; let the resolution be referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will refer the resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

SALARIES OF GEORGIA POSTMASTERS.

Mr. CLAY. I submit a resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Postmaster-General be, and hereby is, directed to report to the Senate the amounts of salaries of all postmasters in the State of Georgia for the terms of service specified, whose names and terms of service appear on the schedule of such cases in said State hereto attached, adjusted under the act of 1854, and the amount of the salary of each such postmaster adjusted and paid under the act of 1864, so that the difference between the salary paid and the amount of salary ordered paid by the act of 1883 shall appear in each case specified on the said schedule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the resolution go to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CLAY. I think that there should be no trouble about the adoption of this resolution. It is simply asking for information. I am sure that half a dozen similar resolutions have been adopted; I think one during the present session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to think that all similar resolutions have been referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. COCKRELL. Every one, so far as I know.

Mr. CLAY. That is not my recollection. I will, however, submit to the recollection of the Chair, for the reason that the Chair is so situated as to remember better than my myself. Let the resolution, with the accompanying petition, be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution, with the accompanying petition, will be so referred.

SALARIES OF OHIO POSTMASTERS.

Mr. HANNA submitted the following resolution; which, with the accompanying petition, was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Postmaster-General be, and hereby is, directed to report to the Senate the amounts of salaries of all postmasters in the State Ohio for the terms of service specified, whose names and terms of service appear on the schedule of such cases in said State hereto attached, adjusted under the act of 1854, and the amount of the salary of each such postmaster adjusted and paid under the act of 1864, so that the difference between the salary paid and the amount of salary ordered paid by the act of 1883 shall appear in each case specified on the said schedule.

To the Senate:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 8th instant (the House of Representatives concurring), I return herewith Senate bill No. 3316, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to create a new division in the western judicial district of the State of Missouri,' approved January 24, 1901."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, January 12, 1903.

TRUSTS AND CORPORATIONS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that additional copies may be printed of the pamphlet which contains a letter of the Attorney-General on the subject of trusts, the speech of the Attorney-General at Pittsburg, and the existing law on trusts, which was ordered to be printed. I ask that 2,000 additional copies of the pamphlet be printed for the use of the Senate. It will not take $500.

Mr. COCKRELL. And that it shall be sent to the Senate document room for distribution?

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that 2,000 additional copies of the document to which he refers may be printed. The Senator from Missouri suggests that it be sent to the Senate document room for distribution. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and the order is made.

THE STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. FORAKER. I desire to give notice that on Wednesday next, at the conclusion of the morning business, I shall, with the indulgence of the Senate, make some remarks in support of the statehood bill.

COMMISSION TO INVESTIGATE PENSION LAWS.

ANTHRACITE COAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over by unanimous consent from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. VEST on the 5th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to prepare and report a bill amending "An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States," approved July 24, 1897, so that the tariff duty shall be removed from anthracite coal and the same be placed on the free list.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I have strong hope that action will be taken elsewhere which will obviate the necessity for the passage of this resolution, and I ask that it may go over, to be called up at either the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] or myself at an early day. I will state that I have no desire to strangle the resolution.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I shall certainly object to the suggestion or motion of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. I have no assurance that anything will be done in any other place upon this subject. Circumstantial evidence is very strongly against any such assumption.

The recommendation of the President of the United States that the duty be removed from anthracite coal has been before Congress since the 2d day of December, and yet no action has been taken by the dominant party, and no suspicion of any action has been evident anywhere. Under existing circumstances, to now allow this question to go into the uncertain and nebulous future would be equivalent to its defeat. I would prefer not to have any such action taken.

Mr. President, I said in the commencement of this discussion, into which I entered with great reluctance for many reasons, that there was nothing partisan or political in the resolution I had the honor to present. The only partisan feature that has appeared came from the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Rhode Island, who taunted this side of the Chamber with having had the opportunity to put bituminous coal upon the free list in 1894, and, stating that they then declined to do so, he boasted that the Republicans in the Senate at that time, following the lead of Senator Hill of New York, who was opposed to the Wilson bill and determined to defeat it by any means possible, voted solidly for free coal.

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg the Senator's pardon. No Republican voted for free coal.

Mr. VEST. Ah! I understood the Senator had so stated.

Mr. ALDRICH. No; I made no such statement, or any statement analogous to it.

Mr. VEST. Well, Mr. President, I am glad to hear that disavowal, because I was under the impression that the Senator had so stated.

I reiterate my assertion that there is nothing political or partisan in this resolution. I am here as a Democratic Senator defending the suggestion of a Republican President of the United States; and in all my public experience I have never known of such unanimity of public sentiment throughout the whole Union, extending even throughout the South, where the weather does not make coal a necessary article, as exists everywhere in regard to removing the duty on coal and sustaining the President.

I have been informed since the adjournment of the Senate last Thursday that the legislature of the State of the Senator from Rhode Island, the chairman of the Finance Committee, rock-ribbed and anchored on the protective policy and Republican in all its departments, on the 8th of January, when we were discussing this question in the Senate, voted unanimously, without one single dissenting vote, in favor of removing the duty upon anthracite coal.

I do not know the political complexion of the newspapers from which the extracts I have here were taken, but I will ask the Secretary to read them. I presume they come from Republican papers, for it is my impression that Democrats have been exceedingly scarce in the State of Rhode Island, and if there is a new supply on hand there I am very glad to hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read from the News, of Providence, R. I., of January 8, 1903, as follows:

FREE COAL AGITATION.

Senator ALDRICH, of Rhode Island, is placed in a most peculiar predicament by the passage in the general assembly yesterday of a resolution presented by Speaker Jackson, of this city. This resolution officially requests the members of Congress from this State to use their best efforts to secure the passage of such legislation as will place coal on the free list.

This met with the approval of all the members of both houses of the legislature, no voice being raised in objection, and it was given immediate consideration by the upper and lower branches, being passed in less time than one would assume, and there was evidently but one opinion regarding coal among the members of the legislative bodies of the State.

Senator ALDRICH is considered to be one of the highest authorities on the tariff in the United States. He has been prominent in all tariff legislation in the Senate and as a Republican leader has received great prominence by his guidance of the forces of that party in Congressional battles concerning protection of American industries.

It was on the pendency of Senator VEST's bill to remove the tariff on coal that Senator ALDRICH gave notice in the Senate that he would to-day make reply to Senator VEST, and he based his reply on the objection of the owners of coal and oil fields in Wyoming and Texas to such removal.

Senator ALDRICH no doubt has excellent motive for such defense of the tariff on coal, and as a leader of the Republican party he may make such reply, but in the face of the action of the Rhode Island general assembly yesterday he can not represent the people of Rhode Island. As the representative of the citizens of this State it would seem that he must join in the demand for the removal of the duty on coal, even though against his own judgment and against his desire, because of the enactment of the formal request by the sovereign power of the State.

In view of fuel conditions which have obtained in Rhode Island for the past six months Senator ALDRICH can not consider he is representing his own constituents in opposing the removal of the tariff to the extent of admitting free from tax bituminous coal imported. While the duty may have benefited the producers of coal it is also a fact that the coal operators have benefited themselves and have made preparation to recoup all losses because of the strike of the miners by the increase of the price of coal more than 11 per cent.

Mr. VEST. Now, I ask that the other article may be read.

The Secretary read from the Journal, of Providence, R. I., of January 8, 1903, as follows:

MR. ALDRICH AND THE COAL DUTY.

On Wednesday both branches of the general assembly of this State unanimously passed resolutions asking Rhode Island Congressmen to do everything in their power to secure the removal of the duty on anthracite coal. The Providence Board of Trade at a meeting on Tuesday unanimously passed a resolution requesting Senator ALDRICH to aid "by all possible means" in the passage of Mr. LODGE'S measure repealing the duty on coal for ninety days. On every hand in this State one hears protests against this duty, and public sentiment seems to be unanimously on the side of the President, who, in his message, asked for its removal.

Yet Mr. ALDRICH, who rarely makes speeches, yesterday opposed the Vest resolution Perhaps he is right in declaring that it would avail nothing; perhaps he is right in saying that the measure infringes upon the constitutional prerogatives of the House: it was fair political tactics also to charge the Democrats with not removing the duty in 1894. But none of these arguments relieves the Republicans from the responsibility of putting on the present duty.

Senator PERKINS, a Republican from California, has already explained why he requested that the tax be levied, and Senator ALLISON, one of the Republican leaders, has admitted that it was put there for just the same reason that other protective duties were levied. It is idle now to bicker over what the Democrats did not do in 1894 or what the Republicans did in 1897. The country expects the Republicans, the majority party, to do something in 1903.

What the people in this part of the country want is free coal, and they want it now. The unanimous votes of the general assembly and of the board of trade represent general feeling here, where the do-nothing theories of the "stand-patters" are received with no patience or respect. Mr. ALDRICH'S contention that the resolution of Mr. VEST was intended simply as a text for a political speech may be true. But whatever the motives were which prompted its presentation, it provides for free coal, and that is what everybody wants except those whose "pocket nerve" would be affected and the "stand-pat" element in Congress.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have had these extracts read, not to embarrass the Senator from Rhode Island, who is perfectly competent to manage all differences between himself and his constituency, but I desire to place the proof before the Senate that a unanimity of sentiment exists upon this question without regard to section and without regard to political opinions.

A friend tells me since I spoke last to the Senate that at the last election in Rhode Island a Democrat was elected governor. To show how little attention I have paid recently to political affairs, I was actually not aware of that fact; and I am glad now to hear it.

I wanted to lay before the Senate and the country the astonishing public feeling on this subject that now exists in every section of the country. If there is this feeling now, what will it be in the next two months of severe winter weather which we must expect?

Mr. President, there is one other question to which I desire to refer, and then I hope I shall have to say nothing more in this debate. When I alluded, perhaps unfortunately, to a statement made by the late Nelson Dingley with regard to the high duties in the bill that bears his name, and which he said were made higher in order to form a margin or basis for subsequent negotiations with foreign nations in the shape of reciprocal arrangements, the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] indignantly and fiercely, if that word is parliamentary, denounced the statement as a falsehood and spoke of the author of it, an attaché of a Republican paper in Philadelphia, the Bulletin, as an irresponsible newspaper correspondent, or words to that effect.

Now, Mr. President, since the adjournment of the Senate on Thursday a letter has been addressed to me by a member of the National House of Representatives, a gentleman in every sense of the word, a man of the highest character, the Hon. Mr. FLEMING, of Georgia, and he sends me a letter addressed to him just after the passage of the Dingley bill, in which Mr. King, at that time a member of Congress from Utah, not now in office, a gentleman of the highest standing, about whose probity and veracity there can be no question, states the substance of a conversation he had with Mr. Dingley in regard to his bill. I ask that these letters be read by the Secretary. The Secretary will please first read the letter to me from Mr. FLEMING, and then the original of the letter addressed to him by Mr. King.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 11, 1903.

Senator GEORGE G. VEST, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I was an interested listener in the Senate on the 8th instant to the debate in which you engaged regarding the position of Hon. Nelson Dingley on some of the high schedules of the Dingley tariff bill.

Perhaps I can give you some additional facts bearing on that interesting subject.

During the Fifty-sixth Congress I was intimately associated with Hon. William King, the member of the House from Utah, a gentleman of unimpeachable integrity and the highest sense of honor. In discussing the general subject of the tariff he repeated to me a communication he had with Mr. Dingley a short time before his death, which occurred January 13, 1899.

I regarded the opinions expressed by Mr. Dingley as of so much importance that on my return home to Augusta, Ga., I wrote Mr. King and requested him to give me in writing his recollection of what Mr. Dingley said, in order that I might make no mistake should I ever have occasion to refer to that subject.

I now inclose you Mr. King's reply, and authorize you to use such portions of it as you think proper. No one acquainted with Mr. King will doubt the correctness of his statements.

Very truly, yours, WM. H. FLEMING.

KING, BURTON & KING,
LAWYERS, ROOMS 62-65 COMMERCIAL BLOCK,
Salt Lake City, Utah, June 1, 1901.

Hon. WILLIAM H. FLEMING, Augusta, Ga.

MY DEAR Mr. FLEMING: Yours of the 22d ultimo, asking me in regard to the conversation which I had with the late Mr. Dingley concerning the tariff, is at hand. In reply will say that I do not remember exactly his words, but I think I can substantialty give you his statement.

We were walking from the Ebbitt House corner up to the Hamilton, where he was then stopping, and I was criticising the Dingley bill and especially its effects upon manufacturing interests in the New England States. The discussions in the House at that time were interesting from the fact that the Democrats were calling attention to the strikes which were going on amongst the New England operatives and to the fact that the cotton manufacturing industry was growing at a marvelous rate in the Southern States. Mr. Dingley and myself discussed this matter and the contention that was being made that there should be a constitutional amendment restricting the hours of labor. I proceeded to argue that the tariff on raw materials was injurious to the manufacturer and that the policy of the Republican party in the past, as respects the tariff, had built up the manufacturers until they had become so powerful as to completely dominate the Republican party and almost control the Republic.

[He (Mr. Dingley) stated that he would not be surprised if within a few years there would be considerable change in the sentiment of the people in regard to the tariff question; that perhaps we had gone too far in our tariff schedules upon many articles; that he would not be surprised to see a demand for free raw material. (I am not sure whether he limited the words "free raw material" to coal, wool, and hides, or not. I know I had mentioned those three articles in the conversation.) He also gave it as his opinion that we would have to have foreign markets. I told him that that was good Democratic doctrine and that we had been contending for years for a policy that would give us the markets of the world. He laughed and replied that whether it was Democratic doctrine or Republican doctrine it was good doctrine, and added that in order to secure and maintain the markets of the world we would probably have to make some changes in our tariff system.]

I did not make any notes of this conversation, although I have referred to it a number of times. I would not, of course, under any circumstances, want to do Mr. Dingley or his memory an injustice; still, I think he has made similar statements to others. I have no objection to your using this if you see proper.

I read with great interest your interview from the Augusta Chronicle, entitled "A reunited Democracy." It is needless for me to say that I was very much pleased with the same and concur in the views so clearly expressed by you. However, I am now out of politics and am not giving as much attention to political questions as I have done in the past. Nevertheless, I am interested in the welfare of the party and sincerely hope that the policy will be pursued, which will give us victory in the future. But it looks to me now as though everything were going the Administration's way. It has beaten us on the silver question and defeated us upon imperialism. The Democratic party will have to stand upon the time-honored principles of the past. I do not see any show for it to be the affirmative party in the next campaign. It will be compelled to pull back instead of push forward. Its mission will be to defend the Constitution and try and preserve the Republic. It is a high mission but not a popular one in this commercial age. The West is Republican. Colorado will be Republican sure the next Congressional election, unless something unforeseen occurs. The next House will show no Democratic gains. However, it is not my purpose to talk politics.

I would be very glad to see you and Mrs. Fleming and enjoy a social evening together. Present my compliments to her and accept my best wishes for your welfare.

I remain, sincerely yours, WILLIAM H. KING.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have had read in its entirety the letter of Mr. King, because my instincts as a lawyer would prevent me from giving in evidence a mutilated document or one of which portions had been suppressed, although not pertinent to the matter at issue.

I call attention to the fact that while in his conversation with Mr. King, about which there can be no possible question, Mr. Dingley did not use the words "reciprocity" or "reciprocal arrangements;" he stated clearly and emphatically that he apprehended changes in the near future as to the schedules in his bill, and that these changes were necessary in order to obtain foreign markets for American goods. Unquestionably the trend of Mr.

Dingley's mind at that time was in the direction of reciprocal arrangements, which have since been made. I have no more doubt that the attaché of the Philadelphia Bulletin honestly and truly represented what Mr. Dingley stated to him than that I now address the Senate. What sort of motive could there have been in a Republican and high-tariff organ misrepresenting Mr. Dingley?

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Missouri permit me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. The very extracts which the Senator had read from the Secretary's desk show that the newspaper, while it may have been a Republican newspaper, is opposed to the present policy of the Republican party so far as tariff duties are concerned and is a strong advocate, with the Senator from Missouri, of what might be called tariff reform.

Mr. VEST. If that be so and if that argument is a good one, what is to be done with the Republicanism of the chairman of the Congressional committee of the Republican party [Mr. BABCOCK], who a year ago declared that the tariff schedules in the Dingley bill were too high and must be changed? He declared emphatically, and it was the truth, as I showed here in the discussion on the McKinley bill from export journals, that our manufacturers, after supplying the home market, were selling their surplus abroad at from 35 to 50 per cent less than they were charging their own countrymen, and yet they were demanding a protective tariff of from 40 to 60 per cent in order that they might compete with the labor of other nations—"the pauper labor," as it is termed by the spellbinders of the Republican party. There are hundreds of Republicans, as good as ever lived, who think those duties are too high.

I protest now in the name of humanity against this "stand-pat" policy which disregards the suffering, the disease, and the deaths in this country in order to preserve the enormous duties, higher than were ever imposed by any other civilized country in the world, and which can not be defended except upon a single argument, that the manufacturers of the United States are the favored class who are to have their interests advanced at the expense of the interests of the remainder of the people.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words with respect to the statement made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], in which he quoted the late Mr. Dingley as having said in effect that the rates in the Dingley tariff were purposely made higher than they would otherwise have been with a view to their subsequent reduction by reciprocal trade arrangements with other countries. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] challenged that statement, and seemed to construe it as involving a charge of moral turpitude against Mr. Dingley as the author of the bill.

I can not see, Mr. President, that there is anything wicked or iniquitous in the action attributed to Mr. Dingley. On the contrary, it seems to me that from his standpoint as a protectionist it was a most natural and proper and necessary thing to do. Mr. Dingley was a stanch protectionist. He believed that free trade or a low tariff meant ruin and destruction to American industries. If, while preparing a tariff bill avowedly for protection, he anticipated subsequent reductions by reciprocity arrangements, it was his duty as a consistent protectionist to make the rates of duty so high in the first instance that they would remain amply protective after all the anticipated reductions had been made. If he had made the rates of duty only sufficient in the first place for just purposes of protection, any subsequent reduction of those rates, according to his view, would have resulted in ruinous competition from abroad, and it certainly was no part of his programme to gain foreign markets by the sacrifice of a single American industry.

The statement has been made that the reciprocity provision was not inserted in the bill until after it came to the Senate. But, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] says, that has nothing whatever to do with the case. It need not have been put in the bill at all. The question is, Did Mr. Dingley and his associates, when they framed that bill, have reciprocity in mind? Did they anticipate future reductions of those duties by reciprocity? Upon that question, Mr. President, there can be no room for doubt. Mr. Dingley knew that reciprocity was a part of the programme to which the Republican party was solemnly pledged. The Dingley bill was enacted in 1897. In 1896 the Republican party had linked reciprocity and protection together in the same clause of the Republican platform. It had declared that they must go hand in hand—that reciprocity was the handmaid of protection.

It is plain therefore that when Mr. Dingley drafted the bill he anticipated extensive changes in the rates of duty, and I say as a consistent protectionist he intended that the rates of duty should remain high enough for all purposes of protection after all the reductions and concessions had been made.

Mr. President, this is not a new idea which has been suddenly sprung upon the country. It is not the creature of Democratic imagination or suspicion. It has been openly and publicly proclaimed by very high Republican authority, and I beg leave now to call the attention of the Senate to an extract from a speech made by the Hon. John A. Kasson, who has figured so conspicuously, but to so little purpose, in this reciprocity business. In a speech made before the Illinois Manufacturers' Association on October 24, 1899——

Mr. SPOONER. What does the Senator propose to read?

Mr. CARMACK. It is an extract from the speech of Mr. Kasson, delivered before the Illinois Manufacturers' Association. He said:

> You all know that in obedience to this instruction—
> Referring to the language of the Republican platform—
> You all know that in obedience to this instruction Congress passed the tariff act of 1897, known as the Dingley Act, which not only restored protective duties, but increased them. It must be remembered, however, in respect to this increase, that they at the same time provided for a reduction by international reciprocity. Congress evidently believed that adequate protection would remain after the deductions, which they authorized by treaty.

Now, Mr. President, it is plain that Mr. Kasson understood that the rates of duty in the Dingley bill were purposely made excessive and exorbitant even from the standpoint of the most extreme protectionist with a view to their subsequent reduction by reciprocity.

But, Mr. President, what has become of reciprocity? What has become of the handmaid of protection? Where is this "maiden all forlorn" who was to march down the aisles of Congress leaning upon the stalwart arm of protection to the inspiring strains of a wedding march? Where is the reciprocity to which the Republican party was pledged in its platform of 1896.

Reciprocity has been strangled by protection. It has been murdered in cold blood by protection. The beneficiaries of the protective tariff, the protected manufacturers and the protected trusts of the country, have appropriated to themselves every particle of the tariff duties provided in the Dingley tariff act; not only that part which was put there for their special protection, but the margin which was put there as a basis for bargaining for reciprocity. They have taken every part of it and appropriated it to their own use and refuse to surrender any part of their spoil.

Mr. President, we have reciprocity treaties pending in the Senate. They have not been acted upon, and in my judgment will not be acted upon. Yet the very last public utterance of Mr. McKinley was an earnest and eloquent plea for broader and more liberal trade relations. He said that the day of exclusiveness had passed. Yet the spirit of protection as displayed in this Chamber and in this Congress is as rigid and as exclusive and as narrowly selfish as it ever was. It inculcates a spirit of blind and besotted and superstitious idolatry of the Dingley Act as something sacred and which must not be touched. That is clearly shown with respect to the duty on anthracite coal.

It has been said by a member of the President's Cabinet that this tariff was "sneaked" into the act. Mr. President, it was put there. It was put there by the Republican party. But however it got there, it is there, and though the whole country is shivering in the grasp of winter and millions of people are suffering for lack of fuel, no effort is being made by the party responsible for the legislation of this country to get rid of that tariff.

I have heard it said—the objection has been urged in Republican newspapers—that if we undertake to repeal this duty, it will open up a discussion of the whole tariff question; and so the Republican Secretary of the Treasury, to obviate that calamity, has hit upon a method of his own to relieve the situation. It is the simple expedient of suspending the duty, the simple expedient of abolishing the law, an act, a statute, enacted by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, in a speech delivered by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] during the campaign at New Haven, in which he recited all the shining deeds of the Republican party, he is quoted as having said:

> Who let coal come in without a rigid inspection of the amount of required carbon? The Republican Secretary of the Treasury—Shaw.

In other words, who assumed the right to suspend an act of Congress? Who assumed the right to abolish a statute of the United States? Who but a Secretary of the Treasury, a Republican Secretary of the Treasury—Shaw.

Mr. President, if, before this incident had taken place, the question had been asked in any schoolroom in the country, Who was it that assumed the right to suspend a law of the land, every boy in that schoolroom would have answered that it was done by the Stuart Kings of England. But the Senator from Massachusetts has taught them a new answer. Hereafter it will not be said that it was done by the Jameses or the Charleses of Great Britain. It was a Republican Secretary of the Treasury—Shaw. Who was the great nullifier? It was not John C. Calhoun. It was a Republican Secretary of the Treasury—Shaw.

Mr. President, if this Republican Secretary of the Treasury can assume the power to suspend a single duty enacted by the Congress of the United States, he may wipe the whole law off the statute book; he may practically abolish every custom-house on our coast with as much indifference as the President of the United States abolishes a Southern post-office in a Democratic community. If this law is so wicked, if it is so iniquitous, if it is so oppressive in its effects as to justify this revolutionary proceeding, then this Congress ought to hasten to wipe that law off the statute books, even though it involves the awful admission of human imperfections in the inspired Dingley law.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the nonpartisan purpose of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] in presenting this resolution is being rapidly disclosed. The speech of the Senator from Missouri himself and the calm and dispassionate statement of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] who has just taken his seat, furnish confirmation of the statement which I made to the Senate the other day that there was no purpose in the presentation of this resolution except to engage the Senate in a partisan discussion over the tariff and to devise some means to prevent taking the duty from coal.

I said then that there is no man in this Chamber who does not know that there can be no practical result looking to the relief of the situation by the adoption of the resolution of the Senator from Missouri. The Senator knows it as well as I do, and this discussion is merely for the purpose of debating questions outside of the coal situation.

The Senator from Missouri has caused to be read at the Secretary's desk extracts from certain newspapers published in my State. I think the people of Rhode Island thoroughly understand my position upon the tariff question. There never has been, so far as I know, any disguise in the past, and I am sure there will be no disguise in the future, as to that position. I shall continue to act, as I have heretofore, upon this, as upon all other questions, as my conscience and my judgment shall dictate.

I have seen the Senator from Missouri—and we have all honored him for it—stand in his place in the Senate, in the face of instructions of the legislature of his own State, and say "while I remain in this body I shall undertake, acting upon my own judgment and my own conscience, to perform the duties which I have sworn to perform, and I shall defend the Constitution of the United States as I understand it." I am a little surprised therefore that my friend the Senator from Missouri should bring here and have read the attacks of newspapers upon a Senator as a part of his argument upon what he says is a serious question.

I said to the Senator from Missouri this morning, in making the suggestion I did—and I did not say it without knowledge—that I had strong hopes that in the very near future action would be had elsewhere which would obviate the necessity for adopting or considering this resolution. I repeat it. I believe that before this resolution could possibly be adopted action will be taken elsewhere which will preclude the necessity of any action on the part of the Senate in this direction.

As I made the statement here with deliberation that the late chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House had never at any time or under any circumstances made the statement which was attributed to him by the Senator from Missouri, perhaps I should state the reasons which led me to make that statement. The Senator, in justification of his charges, had read at the Secretary's desk an extract from a newspaper, which is as follows. This statement is in quotation marks and purports to state the views of the late Mr. Dingley with accuracy:

> We are purposely—
> Referring to duties—
> making them too high, because we want them as a basis which will enable us to offer foreign countries material inducements to enter into reciprocity treaties with us.

Mr. CARMACK. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. ALDRICH. I am reading from an article in the Philadelphia Bulletin which purports to be a statement made by a member of the staff of that paper of a private and confidential conversation which he had with Mr. Dingley.

Mr. SPOONER. Alleged.

Mr. ALDRICH. Which he alleged that he had with Mr. Dingley, in the month of March, 1897.

Mr. CARMACK. Is it stated that it was a confidential conversation?

Mr. ALDRICH. The editor of the Bulletin in his letter of transmission to the Senator from Missouri makes this statement:

> The conversation, you will bear in mind, was entirely of a private and confidential character.

Now, as stated by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], four years after Mr. Dingley's death, this anonymous writer pretends to give accurately a conversation of a private and confidential character, when there is no possible power of denial on the part of the alleged author.

I wish to say that it was not only physically but morally impossible that Mr. Dingley could have ever made any such statement. He says it was made in the month of March, 1897, when the tariff bill which bears Mr. Dingley's name was under consideration, and made at a hotel, not in the House, because the bill was reported on the 15th of March. The Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives commenced the consideration of the tariff act of 1897 early in the fall or winter of 1896. They had proceeded so far with the preparation of that bill that on the 3d day of February, 1897, they sent the bill to the Public Printer to be printed, and it was printed substantially in the form in which it was afterwards presented and reported from the Ways and Means Committee.

The bill then printed contained the reciprocity provisions as finally adopted by the House and it was in almost every respect identically the bill which passed the House of Representatives.

The committee were not in the month of March considering any possible question of the rates with reference to reciprocity, because the reciprocity provisions which were afterwards inserted in the House bill, and which came to the Senate, were in that bill more than a month before this conversation was alleged to have taken place.

As the member of the Finance Committee who would probably have this bill in charge in the Senate when it came here, Governor Dingley, I will say, was in frequent conference with me as to the provisions of that bill. I was advised by him from time to time as to the steps that were taken, as to the duties that were fixed, and as to the progress which was made in the consideration of the bill.

I know as well as I know anything that if Governor Dingley had ever had any such idea or any such purpose, I should have known it. There is not a man within the hearing of my voice who does not know that Mr. Dingley was one of the most straightforward men who ever lived. He was absolutely so in his purposes.

Mr. CARMACK. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. I will ask the Senator if he does not think that Mr. Dingley in framing the bill anticipated that changes would be made in those duties in the future by reciprocity arrangements?

Mr. ALDRICH. I know that he did not.

Mr. CARMACK. Did he not expect the Republican party to carry out the pledge of its platform?

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. CARMACK. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. He did not, except to the limited extent provided in the bill itself. The Committee on Ways and Means undertook to define definitely and clearly the reciprocity provisions they believed should be inserted. The third section of the bill as it came here from the House exemplified the views of Mr. Dingley and the Committee on Ways and Means in that regard, and I intended very soon, if the Senator had not interrupted me, to call the attention of the Senate to those provisions. I was about to say that it was impossible, physically as well as morally, that Mr. Dingley in the month of March could have made any such statement to anybody. I knew his views perfectly upon this question, and I feel justified in making the denial of any such feeling on his part as broad and as emphatic as it is possible for the English language to make it. I say that it was physically impossible, because the bill was already in print, had been prepared nearly a month before this conversation is alleged to have taken place, and the provisions of the law as finally adopted having reference to reciprocity treaties had never been heard from.

What did Mr. Dingley and his committee and the House of Representatives do in regard to reciprocity? They prepared a scheme of limited reciprocity. It provided that if arrangements reciprocally advantageous to us should be made with foreign countries producing certain articles, the duties upon these articles might be fixed at rates below those imposed by the bill. Now, what were those articles, and what was necessary to be done to secure these reciprocal arrangements? Those articles were argols, chicle, champagne, brandies, wine, mineral waters, paintings and statuary, and silk laces, the duties upon which were all revenue duties. They did not protect in a single instance any industry in the United States and were not intended to do so. Mr. Dingley and his committee said to the other countries of the world, "If you make reciprocity arrangements"—not treaties, mind you, but reciprocity arrangements—"by which you will admit into your various countries articles produced in the United States under certain conditions, we will authorize the President to announce that fact by proclamation, and upon its announcement a lower rate of duty upon these various articles shall go into force here."

Mr. CARMACK. What American products were mentioned in that section 3? I ask for information.

Mr. ALDRICH. Argols, I imagine, had been produced possibly to a very slight extent in California. Chicle never had been produced here.

Mr. CARMACK. The Senator did not understand me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. What American product was provided for to secure better trade arrangements?

Mr. ALDRICH. The general products of the United States; agricultural and manufacturing products.

Mr. CARMACK. General?

Mr. ALDRICH. The general products.

Now, Mr. Dingley and his associates upon that committee had in view a limited reciprocity, not in the way of commercial treaties, because there was no provision for treaties in the third section. It simply said that whenever these countries shall make such arrangement or such reduction of their duties, or give us other advantages which were equivalent in the opinion of the President of the United States, these new rates should go into force. They did not affect any American industry to any considerable extent or any of the protective duties in the bill.

Mr. BURTON. As I understood it, they were not to affect any products that we produced here in the United States.

Mr. ALDRICH. There was one exception to that rule, and only one, which I will allude to later.

In the list I have read every Senator can see for himself that the duties levied are not protective duties, but are revenue duties, in our general understanding of the word. So the reduction contemplated was simply a reduction from one rate to another upon other countries giving us an equivalent. The exception was the case of sugar. There was a provision made for the reduction on sugar in this reciprocity arrangement, that being the only other article except those that I have mentioned that was covered by this provision.

There is a wide difference of opinion in this Chamber, and always has been, as to whether the duties on sugar are protective duties or revenue duties. But however that may be, the duty upon sugar fixed in this section was a definite duty. There was no chance for expansion or reduction beyond the rates fixed in the bill.

These provisions were the only possible provisions in regard to reciprocity that Mr. Dingley could have had in his mind at that time.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish the indulgence and courtesy of the Senator from Rhode Island to the extent of agreeing to let the resolution go over before it gets on the Calendar, because I want to make some remarks on it to-morrow.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggested when I rose this morning to the Senator from Missouri, whose resolution this is, that the matter should go over for another purpose. He rather indignantly rejected my suggestion, seeming to think that I must have had some purpose which was not apparent to other people in having it go over. The course suggested by the Senator from South Carolina is perfectly agreeable to me. It is very evident that I shall not be able between now and 2 o'clock to finish.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is what I wanted the Senate to agree to, because while I shall talk on this resolution I shall not discuss the tariff.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am very glad to have the assurance of the Senator from South Carolina. Those of us who know him best and like him most will not be surprised, however, if he should in the course of his discussion wander a little to some of the general subjects involved in the tariff.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will please understand that if the hour of 2 o'clock is reached and no unanimous consent is given touching the resolution, it will go to the Calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then I ask that, without prejudice, it may go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the resolution may retain its place on the table until to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RECORDING AND JUDICIAL DIVISIONS OF ALASKA.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the vote be reconsidered by which the Senate on Thursday last passed the bill (S. 4068) to redivide the district of Alaska into three recording and judicial divisions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts desire present action?

Mr. HOAR. I desire present action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill indicated by him was passed on Thursday, the 8th.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Now I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed. A House bill in exactly the same words has been passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the other day I had the honor to present to the Senate the resolutions which were adopted by the nonpartisan single statehood convention held at Oklahoma City, Okla., on January 6. That convention, in point of numbers, was so remarkable, and the conclusions at which it arrived and the reasons for them as presented in the resolutions which I submitted and had read to the Senate were of such force that the weight and consequence of that convention and those resolutions were at once recognized by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

The Senator from Pennsylvania then questioned, perhaps not directly, the representative character of that great body. The point was also made, perhaps only by query, but nevertheless leaving the impression that there were no Indians represented in that convention, and that the resolutions of the convention and the committee's bill which those resolutions indorsed were perpetrating a great wrong upon those original inhabitants of the Indian Territory.

Since then I have procured copies of various papers which, to say the least, give an impartial account of that extraordinary gathering. Of course I am not going to trespass upon the patience of the Senate by reading or having read those newspaper accounts; but I shall myself read briefly two or three very short extracts from each one of them in order to show that the apprehensions of the Senator from Pennsylvania was unfounded, and that this convention, whose remarkable nature attracted his attention at once, justified all the statements which I made concerning it.

Mr. President, I may state at first with reference to the question as to whether Indians were present at that convention that the temporary chairman of the convention was John F. Palmer, an Osage Indian by blood; that the permanent chairman of that convention was A. Gideon Morgan, a Cherokee by blood, and that the temporary chairman was Henry Johnson, a Chickasaw Indian by blood. We thus see that a majority of the officers of this convention were Indians, representing the very people in person whom the Senator from Pennsylvania in his solicitude thought were being wronged by the convention and by the bill which the convention indorsed.

More than that, a considerable number of Indians, as I am credibly informed, were delegates in the convention itself. So much, then, for the Indian element in this convention.

If these statements be true, it disposes at once, and in a most direct and convincing manner, of the charge that some wrong is being done here to a helpless people without their consent, for it is those very people who are helping to ask for the perpetration of that thing which some gentlemen seem to think is a wrong to them.

Now, as to the representative character of this convention, I hold in my hand the Oklahoma State Capital, published at Guthrie. It is one of the papers of that Territory which is ardently against the proposition of making a single State of Oklahoma and Indian Territory, as I am informed and as I believe. It could not, therefore, be expected, Mr. President, that this paper would go out of its way and present an inaccurate statement as to that convention, inaccurate as far as it might reflect creditably upon the convention; that is to say, it could not be supposed that this paper at least, which is ardently opposed to the committee's substitute, would gild any statement with reference to the credibility of that convention. And yet here are one or two extracts from that paper's account of the convention:

THE OKLAHOMA CITY STATEHOOD CONVENTION—SIXTEEN HUNDRED DELEGATES AT THE BIG MEETING—SINGLE STATEHOOD—RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED WHICH WERE WIRED TO CONGRESS—ENTHUSIASTIC MEETING—SENSE OF THE MEETING WAS THAT NEITHER TERRITORY LARGE ENOUGH FOR SEPARATE STATEHOOD—MONSTER PARADE.

[Special dispatch to the State Capital.]

If the numbers and enthusiasm of the single-statehood boomers in convention here to-day are any criterion of the wishes of the people they are supposed to represent, both Oklahoma and the Indian Territory favor admission to the Union as one State. The call for the convention was for 500 delegates from each Territory, but the response was far in advance of that number and is estimated at 900 from Indian Territory and 700 from Oklahoma.

Then it goes on to give an account of the convention, which I have no doubt is substantially accurate, in which it describes the peculiar enthusiasm and earnestness of these men, all of whom, it states, and as the other paper states, were representative in character.

So much for the statement of a paper which supports the contention of the Senator from Pennsylvania and opposes with earnestness the substitute proposed by the committee. I hold in my hand the Kansas City Journal, which is an impartial paper, giving an account of this convention, a very brief extract from which I will read:

Biggest ever held—Statehood convention attended by 1,600 delegates—Omnibus bill not wanted—Convention declares no statehood better than that—Admission of Oklahoma and Indian Territory as one State, as provided for in Nelson bill, demanded—Indians as presiding officers.

I read a part of the special dispatch merely to give its tenor:

This has been the largest convention ever held in either Territory. Every train into Oklahoma City to-day was crowded to its capacity, and it is estimated 5,000 visitors were here from out of town. Several delegations brought bands with them, and the proceedings for the day opened with a parade of delegates and visitors.

The account of the Kansas City Journal corroborates and confirms—I may say that it emphasizes—the at least impartial account given by the Oklahoma State Capital.

Here is the account which appeared in the Dallas Morning News, from which I read very briefly. The accounts in all these papers are very long and exhaustive, because it was a matter of such concern that the papers were willing to pay toll upon an exhaustive account of this convention, although they were themselves located hundreds of miles away and in a different portion of the country. This is from the Dallas (Texas) Morning News.

FAVOR NELSON BILL—NONPARTISAN STATEHOOD CONVENTION AT OKLAHOMA CITY PASSES RESOLUTIONS—FIFTEEN HUNDRED DELEGATES PRESENT—STATEMENT THAT THE PEOPLE OF THE TWO TERRITORIES PREFER NO STATEHOOD LEGISLATION RATHER THAN OMNIBUS BILL SHOULD PASS INCLUDED IN RESOLUTIONS.

Then it states in large type before giving the proceedings the nature of the meeting.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., January 6.

Fifteen hundred delegates in the nonpartisan single statehood convention to-night adopted a series of resolutions incorporating those adopted at Claremore in December, and going even further in asking for the passage of the Nelson single statehood bill.

They accepted the alternative tendered by the advocates of the omnibus bill that they must accept that bill or nothing. The resolutions contain the statement that the people of the two Territories prefer that there should be no statehood legislation rather than that the omnibus bill should pass. This statement was greeted with great applause. The sentiment of the convention was unanimous in this respect. The only matter over which there was controversy was as to the propriety of the statement that neither one has enough area for a State. The number of delegates opposing this statement was small. The convention was composed of a fine body of men. Both of the great political parties were represented, and there were Indians alongside the palefaces. Indians took a prominent part in the organization of the convention. It was the largest single statehood convention yet held.

I hold in my hand a paper, a copy of which I see on the desk of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and which I suppose other Senators may have, because it was sent to me, and I presume it was sent to other Senators—the Daily Oklahoman. That is the only paper from which I have read which favors the proposition of single statehood for Oklahoma and the Indian Territory. The Dallas paper and the Kansas City Journal are, I take it, entirely indifferent. They print this solely as a matter of news. The Capital is for Oklahoma alone; the Daily Oklahoman is for single statehood, composed of the two Territories. If it be true that other Senators have this paper, there is no necessity for reading very much of it; but I call the attention of Senators, and particularly of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], to the editorial descriptive of this convention, which will be found as the leading editorial upon the editorial page, and which I shall not take the time nor the patience of the Senate to read.

Mr. President, I have taken this much time only to call attention to the two points that were made by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Tennessee concerning this convention, its personnel, and the weight and consequence of its proceedings; and I think this a conclusive answer to the apprehensions which are held by either of those Senators.

Mr. NELSON. It is for the interest of the people of a State and it is for the interest of the people of the whole Union that a State be of a good, fair size; that it be commensurate in size with the fair average of the other States. It is for the advantage of the people of the State themselves to have a good, large State, covering the entire industrial field necessary to the development of their agricultural resources.

In the next place, there is not much difference in the make-up of the population of the two Territories. As to the amount of population in each Territory there is not much difference. There is probably to-day in each Territory between 400,000 and half a million people. According to the census of 1890 there were 30,700 Indians and colored people in Oklahoma, and according to the same census there are somewhere in the neighborhood of 88,000 people in the Indian Territory who are members of the Five Nations and belong to some few small Indian reservations which are connected with it.

If you bear in mind that over half of those who are regarded as members of the nation, enrolled and treated as such, are nearly white, many of them entirely white, who have simply become members of the nation by marriage and adoption, you will find that so far as the Indian and colored population is concerned there is not much difference between the two Territories.

When you leave that out of sight, if you come to the character of the residue of the population, the white population of the two Territories is pretty nearly equal. If anything, I think, from all I can learn to-day, the preponderance is in favor of the Indian Territory.

The people of those two Territories are all of the same kind and quality. They are the best of our enterprising pioneers—thrifty, industrious, intelligent—and the people of one Territory are as competent to become citizens of a State as are the people of the other Territory, and it would be no injustice to Oklahoma, so far as the character and intelligence of the population is concerned, to be united with the people of the Indian Territory.

Neither is there much difference in the character of the literacy or illiteracy or the intelligence of the people of those two Territories. According to the census the percentage of literacy—that is, of those who can read and write—in Oklahoma was 94.1 per cent, while in the Indian Territory it was 84.1 per cent. The average of the two combined was 89.1 per cent, or equal to the average rate of literacy, intelligence, and education throughout the whole country.

It should be noted in this connection and taken into account that the small discrepancy in the matter of literacy in Oklahoma and in the Indian Territory arises from the fact that a part of the people in Indian Territory are members of the Five Nations, and the further fact that in respect to the great body of the white people of that Territory they have no system of public schools, as I shall show later on. The facilities for education which exist in Oklahoma and in the other organized Territories of the United States are unknown to the people of the Indian Territory except to a limited extent in a few of the incorporated towns.

If we look at the soil and the natural resources of the two Territories, that of itself furnishes an argument why they should be united in one State. The soil of Oklahoma Territory is nearly all a prairie country, rolling, and in some places a broken prairie with very little timber and no minerals to speak of. There is a little bit of timber along some of the streams, but practically it is pretty much all a prairie country. The eastern part of it is a prairie country and well adapted to the raising of tobacco, cotton, wheat, oats, barley, corn, and other crops of that kind; while the western portion of Oklahoma is within the semiarid belt and is largely fitted and adapted to stock raising. What Oklahoma lacks in order to become industrially and productively a perfect State is entirely made up and supplied by the Indian Territory. In the matter of natural resources and in its soil and climate the Indian Territory is the exact complement of Oklahoma Territory. In the Indian Territory there are over 1,000,000 acres of valuable timber land, consisting in large part of fine yellow pine, besides considerable hickory, elm, maple, ash, walnut, hackberry, pecan, and other timber.

There is also—and that is very important—a large amount of coal, asphalt, and oil lands in the Indian Territory, and also a good supply of granite, limestone, and other building stone. The coal and asphalt beds are quite extensive, especially the former.

Coal is mined on quite an extensive scale. I shall show later on that there is twice the quantity of coal mined in the Indian Territory that there is in the Territory of New Mexico.

As to timber and coal I beg leave to quote from a book I have here, prepared by one of the timber estimaters employed by the Government to examine and estimate the timber in that country, who has gone over it and examined it. Here is what he states:

The appraisement of the timber lands has just been completed, and while no valuation has been put upon them as yet, it is shown that there are something over 1,000,000 acres of commercial timber in the Territory, most of it being in the mountain districts of the Choctaw Nation. This will be a source of great wealth in the future.

The varieties of timber in the Territory are pine, oak, hickory, elm, maple, ash, walnut, hackberry, and pecan. The pecan trees yield a large crop of nuts that are gathered annually.

There are no statistics as to the quantity of coal land, and no one knows as yet the extent of the coal fields. It is known, however, that they underlie from 1,200 to 1,500 square miles of territory, but no one knows how much more. They lie in the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Creek nations principally, and it will undoubtedly develop that large beds of coal exist in the other nations.

Coal and asphalt in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations are reserved to the tribes, etc.

Then he goes on and states as to oil and minerals:

What the future of the Territory will develop in the way of oil fields is at this time a secret religiously kept from the public. The judgment of the writer is that the oil belt of Texas extends entirely across the Territory and will in time enrich this country as it has already enriched Texas.

* * * * * * *

Lead, iron, and zinc are known to exist in the Cherokee, Choctaw, and Creek nations, and some gold and silver has been found, but to what extent they do exist is an unknown problem.

In reference to the coal output and the coal industry of that country, I beg leave to read from the last report of the Secretary of the Interior. He says:

The output of coal for the year ended June 30, 1902, was 2,741,797 tons, an increase over that of the preceding year of 350,109 tons, the total estimated value of the coal so produced being $4,141,368.

The output of coal in that Territory is more than twice that of New Mexico for the same period. For New Mexico it was only 1,086,546 tons.

The output of coke for the same period was 49,279 tons, being an increase of 15,739 tons over the preceding year; the value of the coke production was $203,530. No new coke ovens have been built during the current year.

The number of operators producing coal during the current year was 60, as against 28 for the preceding year. The number of mine openings have increased; 8 slopes have been abandoned; 4 new shafts have been sunk; 30 new slopes and 3 new drifts, showing a net increase of 29 openings for the current year over the preceding year.

A large number of strip pits have been in operation, but owing to the constantly changing character of this work no estimate could be made.

The output of coal for the current year has been very much curtailed, for two reasons: First, at the earlier period there was a shortage of orders, arising to some extent from the threatened introduction of Texas oil to supplant the use of coal formerly supplied from mines in the Indian Territory; and, second, when it later became evident that the demand would be increased, the railroads were unable to furnish cars or move the traffic from the want of engines, and many of the larger companies have been only able to run about half time from the latter causes.

The total number of men and boys employed in mines for the current year was 6,234. For the preceding year 5,272 were employed, thus showing an increase of 962 men and boys.

As contemplated by the agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, practically all of the coal and asphalt mining operations, which have heretofore been carried on under national contracts, are now under formal leases entered into by the mining trustees and approved by the Department, with good and sufficient bonds securing the performance of the stipulations of such leases, payment of royalties, etc. These leases have been made for a term of thirty years, with a royalty on coal of 8 cents per ton, mine run, and on asphalt 10 cents per ton on crude and 60 cents per ton for the refined material. But few leases have been made during the year except such as were in the nature of renewals of old national contracts, the policy of the Department being to discourage speculative applications.

The coal industry of the Indian Territory has steadily advanced, and the output continues to increase, as noted from the following comparative statement:

	Tons.
July 1, 1898, to June 30, 1899	1,404,442
July 1, 1899, to June 30, 1900	1,900,127
July 1, 1900, to June 30, 1901	2,398,156
July 1, 1901, to June 30, 1902	2,735,365

All this, Mr. President, shows what an extensive amount of coal exists in that Territory and to what a large extent the mining industry is carried on there.

I have called attention to this because of its importance in connection with the Territory of Oklahoma, which has neither coal nor timber, and how important it is to have attached to it territory where there is such an abundance of coal as there is in the Indian Territory.

In respect to the timber in the Choctaw Nation, I desire to read from the report of the Dawes Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes:

The timber belt of the Choctaw Nation is in a mountainous region in the southeast part. The Kiamitia Range crosses it from east to west. On either side of the Kiamitias are secondary ranges. With the single exception of the Winding Stair Mountains none of them have any well-defined trend. They are irregular upheavals covered with slide rock. The roads through this region are few and hard to travel. The principal timber of the Choctaw Nation is yellow pine. It is very heavy, mill men placing its weight at 7 pounds to the foot, board measure. This pine grows rapidly. It is full of pitch and the sapwood is much thicker than that of the pine farther north. The growth of the pine is spotted, most of the land being barren of commercial timber. The groves usually cover from 10 to 15 acres. The size of the timber ranges from 8 inches to 16 inches, though 24 to 30 inch timber is found. A great deal of timber has been cut by mill men.

The principal hard wood of the Choctaw Nation is white oak, which is found south of the Kiamitia Mountains, though not of such quality as to be of commercial value. Such cedar as grew here was cut years ago and presumably sold and shipped out of the country. Gum spruce is found along nearly all of the rivers, but its inaccessibility makes it for the most part of no commercial value. There is very little walnut in the country. Cypress grows along the rivers in the southern part of the timber belt. One giant cypress on Mountain Fork measured 40 feet around at the ground. The hickory, basswood, sycamore, hackberry, and elm of the nation are of little value.

The land in the timber belt is for the most part unfit for cultivation. There are occasional spots along the streams where the bottoms are above high-water mark, and these are quite productive. The ratio of available land to that which is too rough or too rocky for cultivation is something like 1 to 100. The uplands and mountains afford some grazing for cattle and excellent mast for hogs. The small farmer in this region has range enough for all the stock he cares to raise.

The mineral resources of the timber belt are are as yet undeveloped. South of the Kiamitia Mountains the formation is slate.

Ledges of "bull quartz" cross-cut the formation in many localities.

Surface indications point to iron, lead, zinc, and coal in many places. There are fables of old Spanish silver mines in nearly every community. Another popular story is about a place where the Indians formerly obtained lead for molding bullets. There are tales of gold in many place, but up to date there has been no prospecting for that metal. Surface indications of copper, manganese, and graphite are occasionally seen. The population of the timber belt is sparse, except around the railroad towns and interior villages.

To illustrate how, under the peculiar conditions in that country, even the timber industry, like the coal industry, is carried on under leases, I will read from the last annual report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, where he speaks concerning the timber and stone industry carried on there:

TIMBER AND STONE.

Contracts for the removal of timber for the fiscal year have been made as follows:

With the Central Coal and Coke Company, for the purchase of 600,000 oak railroad cross-ties and 2,000 oak railroad switch ties. Contract approved October 8, 1901.

Vernon E. Steen, for the purchase of 200,000 feet of oak timber, linear measure, for piling; 2,000,000 feet, board measure, oak timber for bridges. Contract approved October 1, 1901.

Angus McLeod, for the purchase of not exceeding 10,000 feet of oak timber for piling and 600 oak switch ties. Contract approved October 23, 1901.

A. McLeod & Co., for the purchase of 500,000 feet of oak and pine timber for bridges; 40,000 feet, linear measure, of oak timber for piling, and 100,000 railroad cross-ties and 1,000 oak switch ties. Contract approved April 30, 1902.

Kenefick Construction Company, for the purchase of 475,000 oak railroad cross-ties; 2,760 oak railroad switch ties; 2,500,000 feet, board measure, of pine bridge timber; 90,000 linear feet timber for piling. Contract approved March 11, 1902.

John Simpson, for the purchase of 2,500,000 feet, board measure, oak and pine timber for bridges. Contract approved July 11, 1902.

James Elliot, for the purchase of 100,000 railroad cross-ties; 4,900 railroad switch ties; 50,000 linear feet of timber for piling. Contract approved July 23, 1902.

Contracts for the removal of stone have been made as follows:

St. Louis and San Francisco Railroad Company, for the purchase of 700,000 cubic yards of stone. Contract approved August 7, 1902.

Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fe Railroad, for the purchase of 100,000 cubic yards of stone for ballast. Contract approved September 21, 1902.

I call attention to these matters, Mr. President, to show the quality of the timber. A large portion of that timber is oak, valuable for railroad ties and for switch ties, and a large part of it is valuable and fit for bridge timber. Anyone who is at all conversant with the matter knows that the very best timber is used in the construction of wooden railroad bridges. That indicates that the supply of timber in that Territory is abundant and of a good quality.

Now, it is important to the people of Oklahoma, with this supply of coal and timber at their very doors, to have the Indian Territory annexed to them. If it becomes a part of one State, the political authorities of that State, the executive and judicial authorities, will have something to say in the way of legislation and in the way of administration governing the production and transportation of coal. And that that is an important question, Mr. President, we know full well from the experience that this country has had in the recent big coal strike in Pennsylvania. It is important to the people of Oklahoma that the coal fields and the timber of the Indian Territory should be under the same political jurisdiction, the same administrative jurisdiction, in order that they may protect themselves in the matter of monopolies in reference to coal, asphalt, and lumber.

If we look at the topography of the country, we find that from the eastern border of the Indian Territory that country gradually ascends to the westward. Some of the eastern part of the Territory is good agricultural land. The balance of it is rolling and hilly. A good deal of it contains coal, asphalt, and oil, and a good deal of the land is covered with valuable timber. As you go upward the land becomes drier and more rolling. The Indian Territory is not only a great advantage to Oklahoma in the matter of its coal and timber, but it is also of great value to it in other respects. The western part of Oklahoma Territory, as I have stated, is a grazing country. It oftentimes happens that they have excessive droughts there. Vegetation gets scarce. It dries up. Water becomes scarce. Now, the stock raisers can drive their cattle down into the Indian Territory, and there in the hills and the valleys of that country, especially in the timber belt, they can find good grazing and good water.

By combining the two you get, as it were, in natural resources a perfect State—a part of it will be a grazing State, a part of it will be an agricultural State, a part of it will be a mining and lumbering State; and the natural resources that the people need for their own development in the matter of agriculture, in the matter of grazing, in the matter of fuel, in the matter of buildings, etc., they will have in their own midst.

I know that in the great State of Minnesota it is our pride not only that we are a great agricultural State, with immense fine rolling prairies, the finest agricultural and farming lands in America, but, in addition, that we have a fine body of timber—hard-wood timber and pine timber—and, besides that, we have some of the most extensive, largest, and greatest iron mines in all the United States. There is only one thing we lack. If we had the coal which they have in the Indian Territory we would be as near a perfect State in natural resources as we possibly could be, and as Oklahoma and Indian Territory combined will be.

Now, when you separate these two Territories, you isolate them; you make one distinct from the other, you separate their natural resources and their industries, and they become in a certain measure foreign to each other; and when you come to the matter of the transportation and the regulation of transportation and traffic between the two, you are immediately hampered by the restrictions that govern interstate commerce.

If these two Territories are one, the State as a whole will be entitled to regulate, by its legislature and through its laws, transportation wholly within the Territory. It may regulate the transportation of coal from the coal fields of the Indian Territory into Oklahoma; the transportation of cattle and agricultural products from Oklahoma into the Indian Territory; the transportation of lumber from the Indian Territory into Oklahoma, and of asphalt and stone and all other minerals. But the moment you separate them, separate them into two States, the control of each is limited, because under the Constitution each State can regulate and control only that railroad traffic and transportation which is entirely local, within the State, beginning and ending there. So if you undertake to make two States, you immediately make that traffic which naturally will occur between the two subject to the provisions of the interstate-commerce law and to Federal control instead of local control.

We in the West who have had experience in the matter of controlling and regulating railroads and checking their rapacity know the great difference. I know in my own State, Minnesota, we have regulated to a large extent traffic and railroad transportation in our own midst. Yet, in respect to our iron mines, the great iron companies which own the steamship lines bill their iron ore from the interior to the lake ports, and when our board of railroad and warehouse commissioners attempted to regulate that traffic and reduce the rate to a reasonable figure they were met with the contention and the claim that it was interstate traffic, and they claimed that the board of railroad and warehouse commissioners had nothing to do with it.

That is exactly what they can do if you have the two Territories separate. If a carload of coal were shipped into Oklahoma from Indian Territory it would come under the interstate-commerce law and it would come under Federal control, and the State of Oklahoma, if it was admitted as a separate State, with the boundaries it has to-day, would have no power. But if you tie the two together, if you make them one whole, the new State of Oklahoma, or whatever you choose to call it, the new State containing the two Territories combined would have the power within itself to regulate that important traffic. And, Mr. President, how important that traffic is, especially in respect to coal, one of the necessaries of life, we have observed in the recent coal strike in Pennsylvania, of which we are feeling the effects of at this very time, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has so very ably depicted.

Mr. President, a people whose industrial and commercial life is so intertwined and so naturally assimilated as this is ought not to be separated. The farmers and the stock raisers of Oklahoma Territory ought not to be severed and cut off by any arbitrary boundary line from the lumber and the coal and the asphaltum and other minerals of the Indian Territory. All the resources of these two Territories combined ought to be utilized for one great State, for one people, for one of the great republics of the galaxy of American States.

We all know that that State is the most prosperous, grows the most rapidly, acquires the most wealth, its people the happiest, which has the greatest abundance of natural resources in its own midst—a State which in respect to raw material and natural resources is in a condition of independence. A State that is limited to only one class of products or to only a few is handicapped from the very start and handicapped all along as compared with a State which has all these various resources.

There is another fact in this connection of which we should not lose sight. It is this: By the union of these two Territories into one State you will relieve the people of great burdens of taxation. We all know from experience that it is pretty much as expensive to run the legislature of a small State as it is that of a big State. There will be very little difference. If you combine these two Territories into one State, under one State government, you practically save half of the expense that would be involved in the establishment of them as separate States. There will be one executive, one legislature, one judicial system. There will be a few more judges. But one executive department, one set of State officers, one legislature would serve the entire country; and you could have one prison, one capital, and in fact the number of public buildings would be limited.

So in the matter of expense, outside of the local expenses incident to county and municipal governments which occur all over the country whether the State be big or little, you would save the people of such a State by combining the two Territories half the burden of taxation which would be entailed upon them if you separate them into two States. Two States would practically involve a doubling of the expense.

Now, it is for the interest of the taxpayers, for the interest of the great masses of the people not only to have a big State, not only to have a strong State, not only to have a State possessed of all the range of natural resources necessary to make a prosperous State, but it is also in the interest of the people of the State to have it of such a character that the cost of its government will not be a serious load and burden upon the people.

Uniting these two Territories into one would be to put the new State, whatever you choose to call it, Oklahoma or Jefferson, in resources, in population, in intelligence, and in all that goes to make up a great and prosperous State of the American Union on a par with and on a political equality with its older sisters, and the equilibrium of the States would be in no wise disturbed or marred.

There is another reason why the Indian Territory should be attached to Oklahoma. It is this: None of these Territories, neither Oklahoma, New Mexico, nor Arizona, suffers for want of a government. They have well-organized governments in their midsts, with executive departments, judicial departments, legislative departments. They can legislate and do all things necessary for the good of the people—preserve law and order, protect the rights of the people, and establish within their own limits and carry on a good system of public schools.

But how is it in the Indian Territory? In the Indian Territory there are to-day upwards of four hundred thousand white people, practically without any government. The only government all that mass of white people have is in the few local town sites which have been permitted to be created and established in that country, where they have organized local municipal governments. But aside from that and aside from the Federal courts, they are utterly without any legal protection. They can establish no system of public education and no system of schools, and their children are to-day deprived of all the blessings of education which enure to the children of other Territories.

Now, in the other Territories they can organize counties, can organize towns, establish cities, and do practically all that a State can do, except to run into debt and vote bonds to aid corporate enterprises. They can do practically all that is necessary for their industrial and commercial development that can be done in the States. On the other hand, in the Indian Territory we have 400,000 white men of our own blood, industrious, prosperous, and as good as any in this country so far as I know, and those men are utterly helpless. It will not do to call them trespassers. They have come there at the instance and with the permission of the Indians, and at their request. They are there as tenants by sufferance. They have leased a large quantity of land in that country and developed it and improved it, when the Indians, the members of the nation, would not themselves do it. They have built up the towns. They have built up the railroads. They have created the great wealth that there is in the Territory to-day. The enterprise and the energy of the 400,000 white people who are now in the Territory have made the members of the Five Nations amongst the wealthiest people per capita of any class of people in this country.

Now, is it just, is it fair, to leave this great mass of people in that helpless condition and without any government at all? They are here, Mr. President, and ask us and say: "Attach us to Oklahoma Territory, which was originally a part of our country; attach us to that country which, in natural resources, is the complement of our own country; make us a part of that, as we were in the old times, and let us go into the Union with Oklahoma as one State." That is nearly the universal prayer of the people of Indian Territory.

Mr. President, shall we ignore that prayer? There is no urgency in the case of these other Territories. They have, as I have said, well-ordered and well-established governments. They do not suffer for lack of legislation. They do not suffer in the matter of legal protection, but in the Indian Territory there are 400,000 of our own people utterly helpless, as helpless as blind Samson when he was placed between the two pillars in the temple.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not intend to interrupt the Senator at great length, but the last sentence which the Senator uttered reminds me of what I hold in my hand. There are here [exhibiting] perhaps two or three hundred postal cards from school children of the Indian Territory, which, of course, I will not have read or ask to have read, but to which I merely call attention at this moment, supporting precisely the last statement of the Senator from Minnesota, and begging that this Congress shall pass what they denominate here as the Nelson bill in order that they and other school children of that Territory may have some of the facilities of civilized life.

I interrupted the Senator because this bundle of postal cards from school children of the Indian Territory so particularly corroborated the Senator's statement. Later on I shall further direct attention to them.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, these people are without the advantages of county, municipal, and township government except in a few towns, and according to the last report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs there are only 16 towns in which they have a system of public schools. All the rest, outside of the members of the Five Nations, who aggregate only 88,000, are without the advantages of a system of free schools. In a total population to-day of 400,000 white people in that Territory, outside of the Five Nations, only 8,257 pupils are enrolled in the public schools. The following table from the last report of the superintendent of public education in that Territory shows the condition of education in that Territory and the great hardship under which the people labor:

White children in Indian Territory.—Superintendent Benedict in his annual report calls attention to the condition of white children in the Territory. This is a subject which has been discussed in previous reports, and urgently demands consideration by Congress. As Superintendent Benedict says:

"The Indian Territory has a greater population than any other Territory within the boundaries of the United States—greater even than any one of the eight smallest States in the Union. Of the half million people now residing here at least four-fifths are whites, who have come from the various States and have settled here with the intention of making this Territory their future home. They are found in every village and neighborhood, and are engaged in various kinds of business. They do not differ in any wise from the average citizen of the States, possessing the same love of home, family, and country as the average American citizen. The wonderful growth of many of the towns is due to their enterprise, and the development of the thousands of farms now being platted and allotted will depend in very large measure upon their labor."

The condition of the white public schools in the Territory is exhibited in the following table:

Even those schools are not free public schools, because from the statement it appears that they charge tuition. The receipts of the schools are put down at $3,308 from tuition fees. So it seems they charge a tuition fee. Therefore they are not public schools in the full sense that public schools are with us. The balance of the money is raised by local taxation.

Now, Mr. President, is it fair, is it just, to ignore the claims of these people? Is it fair to leave them in that condition any longer? And if it is not fair and not just, why should we not now embrace the opportunity to attach them to Oklahoma? Oh, but it is said, "Make Oklahoma now into a State and leave a provision that the Indian Territory may come in afterwards; it is not yet ripe."

Mr. President, that is utterly unfair. There are as many intelligent people in the Indian Territory as in Oklahoma, and I insist that the people of the Indian Territory—the 400,000 people there—ought to have as much right to participate in a constitutional convention and in forming and adopting the organic act of the State as the people of Oklahoma. If you let them in afterwards—if you let them come in afterwards as a matter of grace and favor, they will have to come in on just the terms and conditions that Oklahoma in her State constitution may provide. But if you let them come in at this time—if you let them come in on a footing of equality, participating in the constitutional convention and in the make-up of the government, they will have an equal and fair voice in saying what that government shall be.

I am happy to say in this connection, Mr. President, that all the people, except perhaps a few Indians, and not many of them, certainly all the white people in the Indian Territory, are in favor of the substitute bill, the bill reported from the committee. They are in favor of uniting these two Territories into one State.

I am also glad to note the fact, and it is a fact, that aside from the politicians and aside from the political schemers, promoters, and the like of that, the great mass of the people of Oklahoma are in favor of united statehood. They believe in having a great, growing, and prosperous State, and not having it cut up into little petty commonwealths.

It is no injustice to the Indians. I shall discuss by and by the condition of affairs there in respect to the Indians. The Indians by implication and by their action have invited all these people to come into that Territory. They have come by the permission of the Indians, and they have built up the Territory and have made it a great and prosperous country. They have built up the towns. They have built the railroads. They have developed the mines and the forests and created the great wealth that there is in that Territory to-day. Without their presence to-day the members of the Five Nations would be comparatively poor indeed, but owing to the efforts of those white people they have become among the richest people in all this country.

So when you come to consider the claim of urgency for statehood, I say in respect to these other Territories their is no intrinsic urgency. They are not suffering for want of a good government. They are not in a legislative strait-jacket which hinders or retards their industrial development. Oklahoma bears witness to that fact. But the poor people of the Indian Territory, our own kith and kin, are handicapped in every way. They are in a political strait-jacket, and if there is any class of our people entitled to immediate relief at this juncture it is the people of the Indian Territory, and now is the accepted time and the opportunity by adopting the substitute bill.

But we are told that it is too early to take any action; that the Indian problem has not been settled; that we have no right to take any action here because it would violate and interfere with Indian treaties and disturb the Indian conditions in that country. Mr. President, the quickest way to solve the Indian problem, the quickest way to bring order out of chaos in that country is to give them a State government. The other questions in connection with the allotment of land and all that will be easily solved, and there will be no difficulty about them. There are no constitutional inhibitions or restrictions against the establishment of a State government over the Indian Territory at this day, as I shall proceed to show later.

What is the status of the people in the Five Nations; what is their condition, and what restraints are there upon our power in this matter? In order that we may understand this question, I shall lapse a little bit into some ancient history and call the attention of the Senate to some of the older treaties with those Indians. A brief summary of the history of those people and their relation to the Government furnishes a key to the situation. The ancestors of those people originally had their homes at various places east of the Mississippi River, in North Carolina, in Tennessee, in South Carolina, in Florida, in Alabama, in Georgia, and in Mississippi. Beginning in 1830, and perhaps before that, down to 1856, they were, under various treaties and in various sections and in various numbers from time to time, moved from their lands east of the Mississippi River, which they were induced to relinquish to the Government, to the country west of the Mississippi River.

These Indians were originally composed of four tribes, the Creeks, Cherokees, Choctaws, and Chickasaws. Then there was another element. Some of these Creeks, at an early day, vagabonds and the hard cases of the tribe, with some other isolated tribes, escaped over the boundary across the border between our country and what at that time was Spanish territory, and went into the everglades of Florida, and there the united mass of these Indians became known as the Seminoles, and they are another of these nations. So we have the Creeks, the Cherokees, the Choctaws, the Chickasaws, and the Seminoles as the Five Nations that go to constitute the so-called Indian population of the Indian Territory.

Now, it is curious to note, and I ask the pardon of the Senate for calling attention to these older treaties, because I shall do so for the purpose, Mr. President, of showing how continually, from the time of the very act establishing Oklahoma Territory down to the present day, the legislative department of the Government of the United States has violated those treaties. In fact, the very establishment of Oklahoma Territory was a violation of these old Indian treaties, as I shall show. If we go back into the legislative and treaty history of the matter; we will find that this removal of these Indians from the East and their colonization in the Indian Territory arose under the following legislation and Indian treaties.

The first act bearing upon this subject was the act of May 28, 1830, 4 Statutes, 411. Under this act the President of the United States was authorized to negotiate with the Indians east of the Mississippi River and secure their cession of lands there in exchange for lands west of the Mississippi River, and by the act of July 14, 1832, he was authorized to appoint commissioners for the purpose of negotiating with the Indians to procure their removal west of the Mississippi River, to secure an exchange of lands with them west of the Mississippi River for lands east of the Mississippi River.

Now, I will give a brief summary of the older treaties that were made with these several nations. I do it for the purpose of showing how, in many respects, we have long ago violated those treaties, and that we violated them in the establishment of Oklahoma Territory.

CHEROKEES.

Treaty of May 6, 1828 (7 Stat., p. 311): The preamble of this treaty states, among other things, that it is the desire of the Government to give the Cherokees a permanent home west of the Mississippi River which shall never, in all future time, be embarrassed by having extended around it the lines—I call attention to that—or placed over it the jurisdiction of a Territory or State, nor be encroached upon by the extension in any way of any of the limits of any of the existing States or Territories.

Article 1 defines the western boundary of Arkansas, the same as now existing. Article 2 agrees to possess the Cherokees with and guarantee to them forever 7,000,000 acres, described by metes and bounds, substantially the same as now occupied by them. In addition it guarantees them a permanent outlet to the west and the free use of the country lying west of the land agreed to be given to them. By article 6 it was agreed, among other things by the United States that, whenever the Cherokees might desire it, it would give them a set of plain laws suited to their condition, etc.

By article 7 the Cherokees gave up all their lands in Arkansas, which had been given them by the treaty of January 8, 1817, and the convention of February 27, 1819.

Treaty of February 14, 1833 (7 Stat., p. 414): By article 1 of this treaty the boundaries, but not the quantity, of the land agreed to be given the Cherokees by article 2 of the former treaty is modified and changed, and in addition the Cherokees were guaranteed a perpetual outlet west (this is the Cherokee Outlet west) and a free and unmolested use of all the country lying west of the western boundary of their 7,000,000 acres as far west as the sovereignty of the United States and their right of soil extended, which was only as far at that time as the western boundary of Oklahoma, barring the public lands acquired by Texas. Our possessions at that time only extended to the western boundary of Oklahoma exclusive of the public lands.

By article 2 the Cherokee Nation relinquished to the United States all the lands ceded to them by the treaty of May 6, 1828, not embraced in this treaty. By article 3 the sixth article of the former treaty was canceled and annulled.

Treaty of December 29, 1835 (7 Stat., p. 478): By article 2 of this treaty an additional 800,000 acres, described by metes and bounds, was agreed to be conveyed to the Cherokees supplemental to the former grant and to make up a supposed deficiency in the 7,000,000 acres agreed to be given to them.

By article 3 the United States agreed that the lands ceded by the treaty of February 14, 1833, including the outlet, and those ceded by this treaty should all be included in one patent executed to the Cherokee Nation of Indians by the President of the United States, according to the provisions of the act of May 28, 1830, which I already quoted in the beginning of my remarks.

By article 5 the United States covenanted and agreed that the land ceded—and I call attention to the fact that this included all the northern part, a strip clear across the Indian Territory, clear across the northern part of Oklahoma—by article 5 the United States covenanted and agreed that the land ceded should not at any future time, without their consent, be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory, and that the Cherokees by their national council should have the right to enact such laws as they might deem necessary for the government and protection of the persons and property within their own country belonging to their people and such persons as connected themselves with them.

By article 7 it was stipulated that the Cherokees should be entitled to a Delegate in the House of Representatives whenever Congress should make provision for the same. Congress has never made any provision.

Treaty of July 19, 1866 (14 Stat., p. 799): Article 1 declares a treaty made with the Confederate States to be null and void. They made a treaty with the Confederate States during the civil war. I may say in this connection that most of these nations prior to the war had slaves, who afterwards became free under the legislation of Congress and were termed "freedmen," and were given an interest in the property and lands of the tribes and are really considered for most purposes, as in distributing the allotments, as members of the nation.

Article 2 grants amnesty for past acts.

Article 3 repeals the confiscation laws and declares all confiscations null and void.

Articles 4, 5, and 6 make provision for former slaves and free negroes, etc.

Article 7 makes provision for the establishment of a United States court in the Cherokee territory for certain cases.

Article 9 abolishes slavery and makes all freedmen members of the Cherokee Nation.

Article 12 provides for a Cherokee legislative body with power to legislate upon matters pertaining to the intercourse of the Indian tribes, nations, and colonies of freedmen resident in said Territory; the arrest and extradition of criminals and offenders escaping from one tribe to another or into any community of freedmen; the administration of justice between the members of different tribes of said Territory and persons other than Indians and members of said tribe.

By article 13 the Cherokees agreed that a court or courts might be established by the United States in said Territory, but retained exclusive jurisdiction in the tribunals and courts of the nation in all civil and criminal cases arising within their country in which members of the nation shall be the only parties, etc.

By article 15 the United States was permitted to give civilized Indians, friendly with the Cherokees, the unoccupied portions of land east of the ninety-sixth degree in the Cherokee country.

By article 16 the United States was given the privilege of settling friendly Indians in any part of the Cherokee Nation west of the ninety-sixth degree of longitude.

I now come to the Creeks. The first treaty material for this case is that of March 24, 1832 (7 Stat., p. 366). By this treaty the Creeks ceded to the United States all their lands east of the Mississippi River.

By article 14 the Creek country west of the Mississippi was solemnly guaranteed to them, and that no State or Territory should have the right to pass laws for their government, but that they should be allowed to govern themselves, as far as was compatible with the general jurisdiction which Congress might be prepared to exercise over them. The United States further agreed that as soon as the boundary of the Creek Nation west of the Mississippi was ascertained it would cause a patent or grant to be executed to the Creeks, agreeable to the act of May 28, 1830.

Treaty of February 14, 1833 (7 Stat., p. 417). By article 2 of this treaty, to which the Cherokees consented, the boundaries of the grant to the Creek Indians were defined, extending from the southern portion of the Cherokee country, between the Arkansas and Canadian rivers westerly to the boundary line of Mexico as it then existed. In other words, they got the whole country (and at that time what is now Texas was a part of Mexico) westward from the eastern boundary of Arkansas. They got a strip clear westward as far as the boundary of Mexico at that time.

By article 3 the United States agreed to grant a patent for the land described in article 2 in fee simple to the Creek Nation.

By article 4 it was provided that the lands thus assigned and agreed to be patented to the Creek Indians should be considered the property of the whole nation—those who were residing there and those who were east of the Mississippi River—and that the Seminole Indians in Florida should have a permanent home in a part of the lands set apart for the Creek Nation, and the Seminoles were to be a constituent part of the Creek Nation, but were to be located by themselves.

Treaty of August 7, 1856 (11 Stat., p. 699). This was a treaty between the United States, the Creeks, and the Seminoles. By article 1 the Creek Nation ceded a given portion, by metes and bounds, to the Seminoles for their use, which constituted a strip of land between the North Fork of the Canadian River and the Canadian River from the Creek country westerly to the one hundredth meridian of west longitude.

Article 2 defines, by metes and bounds, the balance of the land remaining with the Creeks.

By article 3 the United States guaranteed to the Seminoles the tract of country embraced in the first of the above articles, and to the Creek Indians the land included in the boundaries contained in the second of said articles, and that it should be held by the same tenure and title as was guaranteed to the Creek Nation by the fourteenth article of the treaty of March 24, 1832, cited above, and the third article of the treaty of February 14, 1833.

By article 4 the United States solemnly agreed and bound itself that no State or Territory should ever pass laws for the government of the Creek or Seminole tribes, and that no portion of either of the tracts of country defined in the first and second articles should ever be embraced or included in or annexed to any State or Territory, nor should either or any part of either ever be erected into a Territory without the full and free consent of the legislative authority of the tribe owning the same.

It will be observed that this article was violated and broken when Oklahoma Territory was established, because Oklahoma Territory covered a large part of the tracts described in articles 1 and 2 of this treaty.

By article 15 the right of self-government, with full jurisdiction over persons and property, within their respective limits was given to the Creek and Seminole nations.

Article 26 provides that this treaty shall supersede and take the place of all former treaties between the United States and the Creeks, and between the United States and the Seminoles, and between the Seminoles and the Creeks inconsistent with this treaty.

Treaty of June 14, 1866 (14 Stat., p. 785): By article 2 slavery was abolished and the freedmen were made members of and given an interest in the property of the nation.

By article 3 the Creeks ceded to the United States, to be sold and used for homes for other civilized Indians, the west half of their entire domain, the eastern half being retained by them forever as a home, except what is assigned to the Seminole Nation.

By article 10 the Creeks agree to such legislation as Congress and the President may deem necessary for the better administration of justice, etc., but said legislation should in no manner interfere with or annul the tribal organization, rights, laws, privileges, or customs of the Creeks. Said article also provided for a legislative council among the Indians, giving it power to legislate and enact laws for the Indians in said Territory. The Creeks also agree that courts may be established in said Territory.

By this article the United States granted a new reservation, by metes and bounds, to the Seminoles, which is the reservation now held and occupied by them, the aggregate of the reservation thus granted to them being estimated at 200,000 acres, and this reservation was constituted the national domain of the Seminole Indians.

CHOCTAWS.

Article 1 defines and describes the boundaries of the Choctaw and Chickasaw country, being all the territory between Arkansas on the east, the one hundredth meridian of longitude on the west, the Canadian River on the north, and the Red River on the south. And the United States guaranteed the lands embraced in this boundary to the members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes, their heirs and successors, to be held in common, so that each member shall have an equal undivided interest in the whole, provided that no part should ever be sold without the consent of both tribes.

Article 2 segregates and sets apart a certain definite reservation, therein described, for the Chickasaw Indians, and the remainder of the tract embraced in article 1 not assigned to the Chickasaws by article 2 is, by article 3, to be held in common by the Choctaws and Chickasaws and shall constitute the Choctaw district.

Article 21 provides that this treaty shall supersede and take the place of all treaty stipulations between the United States and the Choctaws and Chickasaws inconsistent therewith.

Treaty of April 28, 1866 (14 Stat., p. 769): This is a treaty between the United States and the Choctaws and Chickasaws.

By article 3 the Choctaws and Chickasaws cede to the United States all their territory west of the ninety-eighth degree of west longitude, and provision is made for the freedmen.

Article 8 provides for a legislative council with power to legislate upon all subjects pertaining to the intercourse and relation of the Indians in the Indian Territory, etc. The Chickasaws agree that the United States may establish courts in the Territory, but the jurisdiction of such courts must not interfere with the local judiciary of either nation.

CHICKASAWS.

Treaty of October 20, 1832 (7 Stat., p. 381): By article 1 the Chickasaws cede all their lands east of the Mississippi River to the United States, to be disposed of as the treaty provides. The treaty also contemplates their securing a new home west of the Mississippi River. Their subsequent rights are fixed and covered by the treaty of June 22, 1855 (11 Stat., p. 611), and the other treaties cited above under the head of the Choctaws.

Mr. President, I have taken up the time of the Senate for the purpose of having this compendium of some of the leading, essential portions of the old treaties placed before the Senate to show the limitations and conditions that we imposed on our Government in treating with those Indians, and to show how, from time to time, we have subsequently violated or abrogated those conditions on our own motion, and that our courts have held that we had ample authority under the Constitution to do so.

Patents were issued to the Indians for the lands described in these several treaties, and the Indians were given, as an inspection of the treaties will show, nearly the exclusive right of self-government, with full executive, legislative, and judicial powers over their own people. The Federal Government, too, was inhibited from at any future time including their country within the limits or subject to the jurisdiction of any State or Territory. Under their treaties the several tribes organized themselves into so-called tribal governments, with executive, legislative, and judicial departments.

These governments did not work very well. They turned out to be partisan, arbitrary, and most corrupt. In the meantime white settlers in large numbers, by the connivance or express or implied consent of the Indians, poured into the Territory and settled and developed the country. This led to great trouble and friction with the Indians. The whites were without the protection of law and without courts, except the tribal courts, to which they had no access, and which would no doubt have given them scant justice had they sought relief in them.

The conditions soon became intolerable and grew worse and worse. The first relief given to the people in the Indian Territory was the creation and establishment of a United States court by the act of 1889. The next avenue of relief was found in the carving out and establishment of Oklahoma Territory. This in some essentials, which I need not dwell upon now, but will refer to later in referring to the decisions of our courts, was in derogation and manifest violation of former treaties. The establishment of Oklahoma and opening of the country to settlement brought some relief.

I now ask to call the attention of the Senate to the legislation that was had subsequently to the legislation in connection with the establishment of Oklahoma, and, therefore, I ask the Secretary to read this summary of the legislation as a part of my remarks.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Minnesota whether, when we established the Territory of Oklahoma, we did include within its boundaries any land still belonging to the Choctaws and Chickasaws?

Mr. NELSON. I think we did; there was one case in the Supreme Court, to which I shall call attention, which involved that question.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I had the impression that we included only that portion which they had sold to us by a subsequent treaty.

Mr. NELSON. They had not sold it to us at that time; they sold it to us subsequently. I shall call attention to that fact when speaking of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, where the court impliedly admits that we abrogated or violated that provision of the treaty, but that we had the full legal right and power to do so.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is undoubtedly true that we had that power.

Mr. NELSON. I ask to have read the paper which I sent to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary reads as follows:

LEGISLATION RELATING TO OKLAHOMA AND INDIAN TERRITORY.

By the act of May 22, 1890 (26 Stat., p. 81), the Territory of Oklahoma was established.

Section 1 of this act defines the boundary of Oklahoma Territory, and provides that Congress may at any time thereafter change the boundary of same or attach any portion of the same to any other State or Territory of the United States without the consent of the inhabitants of the Territory of Oklahoma. The rights of the Indians in said Territory are reserved, and jurisdiction over them and their property is retained in the United States.

The act provides for the organization of the Territory and the division of the same into counties; provides for a legislature; for the right of suffrage; defines the jurisdiction of the legislature; provides for courts, a supreme court, district court, probate courts, and justices of the peace; confers Territorial and Federal jurisdiction upon the supreme and district courts; puts certain laws of the State of Nebraska in force and effect as local laws in the Territory; provides for the appointment of a United States attorney and marshal for the Territory; provides that a governor, secretary, chief justice, associate justice, attorney, and marshal shall be appointed by the President; gives the Territory a Delegate in Congress; grants sections 16 and 36 for school purposes; provides for the disposal of the public lands under the homestead and town-site laws, etc.; makes section lines public highways.

Section 29 of this act defines and describes the boundaries of Indian Territory; limits the jurisdiction of United States courts established in Indian Territory under the act of March 1, 1889 (25 Stat. p. 783), to the Indian Territory as defined in this act.

By this last-mentioned act a United States court was established in Indian Territory as it existed before Oklahoma Territory was established. Provision was made for a judge of the court, an attorney, and a marshal, as well as a clerk. The court was given exclusive jurisdiction over all offenses against the laws of the United States committed within the Indian Territory not punishable by death or imprisonment at hard labor.

The court was given jurisdiction in all civil cases between citizens of the United States, residents of Indian Territory, or between citizens of the United States or of any State or Territory therein or any citizen or person residing or found in the Indian Territory when the value of the thing in controversy or the damages claimed shall amount to $100 or more, but no jurisdiction was conferred upon the court in respect to controversies between persons of Indian blood. Final judgments of this court, where the amount in controversy exceeds $1,000, could be reviewed and reversed or affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. Two terms of court were to be held at Muscogee. All proceedings were to be in the English language.

By section 17 the Chickasaw Nation and a portion of the Choctaw Nation, with defined boundaries, were annexed to and made a part of the eastern judicial district of Texas for judicial purposes.

By sections 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, and 26 certain crimes and misdemeanors are defined and punishment prescribed for the same, but the provisions of the same shall not apply to the offenses committed by one Indian upon the person or property of another.

By the act establishing the Territory of Oklahoma, hereinbefore referred to, the act of 1889, establishing a court in the Indian Territory, was largely amended. The United States court established in Indian Territory was given jurisdiction, in addition to that conferred by the act of 1889, in all civil cases in Indian Territory, except cases over which tribal courts have exclusive jurisdiction, and in all cases on contracts entered into by citizens of any tribe or nation with citizens of the United States; that for the purpose of holding terms of court the Territory was divided into three divisions, 1, 2, and 3, and the boundaries of each division established.

Crimes were to be prosecuted in the division in which the offense was committed and civil suits instituted in the division where the defendant lives. The act provided, however, that the judicial tribunals of the Indian nations should retain exclusive jurisdiction in all civil and criminal cases arising in the country in which members of the nation shall be the only parties, and in respect to such cases the laws of the State of Arkansas extended to the Indian Territory should not apply.

Section 31 extends certain general laws of the State of Arkansas to and puts them in force in Indian Territory. The act further provides as follows:

"But nothing in this act shall be so construed as to deprive any of the courts of the civilized nations of exclusive jurisdiction over all cases arising wherein members of said nations, whether by treaty, blood, or adoption, are the sole parties, nor so as to interfere with the right and power of said civilized nations to punish said members for violation of the statutes and laws enacted by their national councils where such laws are not contrary to the treaties and laws of the United States."

Exclusive original jurisdiction is given the United States court in Indian Territory to enforce the provisions of chapter 4, title 70 of the Revised Statutes of the United States entitled "Crimes against justice."

By section 36 jurisdiction is conferred upon the United States court in Indian Territory over all controversies between members and citizens of one tribe and members or citizens of another tribe, and a citizen of one tribe who commits an offense or crime against the person or property of another tribe shall be subject to the same punishment as though he were a citizen of the United States. The United States court in Indian Territory is given power to appoint United States commissioners as United States circuit courts, etc. Such commissioners shall exercise the powers of the justices of the peace as prescribed by the laws of Arkansas, and appeals may be taken from final judgments of such commissioners to the Territorial United States court. Appeals and writs of error may be taken from the United States courts in Indian Territory to the Supreme Court of the United States as in cases from the circuit courts of the United States.

By the act of March 1, 1895 (28 Stat., 693), Indian Territory was divided into three judicial districts, defined and described in the act, and provision was made for the appointment of 2 additional judges, making 3 judges in all, or 1 judge for each district. Provision was made for the appointment of an attorney and marshal in each of said districts, as well as for clerks of the courts. Each of the judges was given the power to appoint court commissioners within his district. Certain portions of the criminal laws and criminal procedure of Arkansas was extended to Indian Territory. The United States commissioners were to have the power of justices of the peace in preliminary criminal examinations. Appeals could be taken from the commissioners to the United States courts.

By section 9 the United States court in Indian Territory was given exclusive original jurisdiction of all offenses committed in said Territory of which the United States court then had jurisdiction, and after the 1st of September, 1896, to have exclusive original jurisdiction of all offenses against the laws of the United States committed in said Territory except such cases as the United States court at Paris, Tex., Fort Smith, Ark., and Fort Scott, Kans., had acquired jurisdiction of before that time. And should also have original jurisdiction of civil cases in the United States court in Indian Territory and appellate jurisdiction of all cases tried before the commissioners. And all laws theretofore conferring jurisdiction upon the United States courts held in Arkansas, Kansas, and Texas, outside of the limits of Indian Territory as defined by law as to offenses committed in said Indian Territory, as herein provided, are repealed, to take effect on September 1, 1896; and the jurisdiction now conferred by law upon said court is hereby given on and after the day aforesaid to the United States court in Indian Territory.

That the several judges of the United States court in Indian Territory shall constitute a court of appeals, to be presided over by the senior judge as chief justice. Said court was to have the like jurisdiction and power over inferior courts in Indian Territory as the supreme court of Arkansas has over the inferior courts in that State, with the same jurisdiction in respect to appeals and writs of error; and the laws of the State of Arkansas, in respect to appeals and writs of error, are made applicable and extended to and put in force in Indian Territory. Writs of error and appeals from said appellate court in Indian Territory may be taken to the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit in the same manner and under the same conditions as appeals from the circuit courts of the United States.

By the act of June 7, 1897 (30 Stat., p. 83), it was provided:

"That on and after January 1, 1898, the United States courts in said Territory shall have original and exclusive jurisdiction and authority to try and determine all civil causes in law and equity thereafter instituted and all criminal causes for the punishment of any offense committed after January 1, 1898, by any person in said Territory, and the United States courts in said Territory shall have and exercise the powers and jurisdiction already conferred upon them by existing laws of the United States as respects all persons and property in said Territory; and the laws of the United States and the State of Arkansas in force in the Territory shall apply to all persons therein, irrespective of race, said courts exercising jurisdiction thereof as now conferred upon them in the trial of like causes; and any citizen of any one of said tribes otherwise qualified who can speak and understand the English language may serve as a juror in any of said courts."

This act also provides for one additional judge in said Territory, making four judges in all.

(This provision in respect to the jurisdiction of the court is clearly in controvention of all existing treaties.)

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCOTT in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not wish to have it understood by the question I asked the Senator from Minnesota that I think there is any obligation growing out of these treaties resting on the United States not to include these lands within a Territory or a State. I think the reason for that stipulation on the part of the United States is entirely gone and passed by. Anybody who is historically familiar with the conditions under which these treaties were made knows that it was the desire of the Indians that they should live by themselves, without white people being among them, to have self-government, and to that the United States then acceded by treaty and agreed to keep out all white people from their domain. They were then a thousand miles west of any white civilization, and nobody supposed or understood that white civilization would overrun that section of the country.

The intention of the parties was that the Indians should have their own government there, which they should administer, and that white people should not interfere with them or invade their domain. But afterwards the Indians themselves invited white people into their Territory, and the white people who are there now are there not only by the consent, but by the invitation of the Indians, contrary to the spirit and understanding which existed at the time the original treaties were made.

So I think the Indians are entirely estopped from saying that the United States is longer bound to its obligation not to include them within the limits of the Territory or the State.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I intended next to show that our Supreme Court has in a number of cases passed upon the question of the abrogation of these treaties by subsequent acts of Congress, but I am informed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]—and I did not know it before—that at 4 o'clock a unanimous-consent agreement provided that pension bills should be taken up. When I next take up this matter I propose to show that this question in various forms relating to the abrogation and changing of these treaties by Congress has been considered by the courts in many cases, and they have repeatedly decided this question. From the time when a case arose under the internal-revenue law of 1867 down to last week, when a decision was rendered in such a case, the Supreme Court has uniformly held that we had full plenary power to legislate in respect to these Indians, and that we were in no wise hampered or restrained by any treaty conditions. But, as I have said, it is my understanding that at 4 o'clock pension bills are to be taken up, and therefore I yield.

Once more, Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, in the dispensation of Thy providence, are we brought face to face with that strange and mysterious thing we call death, by the sudden and unexpected removal of an honored member of this honorable body. Quiet, yet always alert; patient, yet always active; unassuming, yet always efficient, he did his whole duty, and we commend his spirit to Thy care and keeping, who doeth all things well. Comfort, we beseech Thee, his friends and colleagues, the grief-stricken widow and children, with the blessed and reasonable hope that some time, some where, there will be a reunion where friends and families shall dwell together in love and unity forever.

Hear us and thus bless and comfort us all, in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

DUTY ON ANTHRACITE COAL.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I desire to offer again the joint resolution I introduced on the 8th instant, and I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments that I may make a statement.

This joint resolution relates to the duty on anthracite coal, and provides that after its passage anthracite coal and all coal containing less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon when imported into the United States shall be admitted free of duty.

Before I introduced the joint resolution I made the statement that in my opinion it was constitutional notwithstanding that provision of the Constitution which declares that all bills for raising revenue must originate in the House of Representatives. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] characterized that opinion as novel.

Mr. President, I simply take advantage of this occasion to say that instead of being novel it is an opinion shared by distinguished commentators on the Constitution, by many eminent lawyers who have held seats in this body and in the House of Representatives, and that it represents the unbroken precedents of this body since 1815.

In 1871 the Senate passed a bill, which originated here, repealing the income tax, and upon a consideration of that measure an exhaustive report was made by a committee of the Senate, composed of Messrs. Scott, Conkling, and Casserly. I ask that that report be printed in the RECORD as a portion of the statement I am making, because it is exhaustive of the subject, in my opinion, and so far as I am advised the Senate has never departed from the principle announced there from that day until this.

When this joint resolution was before the Senate on the 8th the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] declared that anthracite coal is not dutiable. I have watched with some interest the proof of that which he promised us, but so far he has not seen proper to make any further statement on the subject.

In answer to that contention of the Senator from Connecticut, I ask leave to print in this connection a decision of the Board of General Appraisers, of New York, declaring that anthracite coal is dutiable, and a decision of the circuit court of appeals of the ninth circuit affirming that decision, the opinion being delivered by Mr. Justice Hawley. It is proper to add that an application for a writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court of the United States in this case was denied (177 U. S., 695), which is tantamount to holding that anthracite coal is dutiable under the Dingley Act.

Having made this statement, I offer the joint resolution and request its immediate consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 152) exempting anthracite coal from import duty was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas there is a great distress and suffering in many sections of the country because of the inadequate supply of anthracite coal and the high prices for which it is offered and sold; and

Whereas no revenue of consequence is derived by the Government from the duty imposed thereon; and

Whereas the removal of the duty will add to the supply in the United States and lower the price thereof: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That on and after the passage of this resolution anthracite coal and all coals containing less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon when imported into the United States shall be exempt from duty.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas a practical question. From what source, according to his information, are we likely to get a supply of such coal as he describes in the joint resolution?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, that matter will come up, I think, if there is no objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution. If we are to consider it at all, it would be best to consider it in all of its phases.

Mr. HOAR. I thought possibly, as the Senator made some statement about it before presenting it, he might be willing to tell the Senate, in order that we might see whether it was a practical or a theoretical question. I understand that the Senator's joint resolution describes the present emergency and desires to have the duty taken off of coal which he describes as coal having less than 92 per cent of carbon. In order to see whether this is a question which is of such immediate pressing character that we ought to lay aside all other business and attend to it at this moment, I should like to ask the Senator from what source he expects a supply of that kind of coal to relieve the present emergency.

Mr. CULBERSON. In answer to the Senator, I will repeat that whatever information I have on the subject will be readily given to the Senate if objection is not made to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator know a spot on the face of the earth from which we may expect a supply or a considerable quantity of that kind of coal—anthracite coal of less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, this joint resolution is——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is not now before the Senate. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, as this is but another phase of the question submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], whose resolution is now pending before the Senate and will be laid before the Senate in a few minutes, I object to its present consideration. If the Senator desires to have it before the Senate at a subsequent time for discussion, I am willing that any agreement shall be made as to that matter, or if he desires to have it referred, I do not object to that course. I do object, however, to its present consideration.

The papers submitted by Mr. CULBERSON are as follows:

INCOME TAX.

Mr. Scott, from the committee of conference appointed by the two Houses to consider the question as to the power of the Senate to originate the bill (S. No. 1083) to repeal so much of the act approved July, 1870, entitled "An act to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes," as continues the income tax after the 31st day of December, 1869, submitted the following report:

"The managers on the part of the Senate of the conference committee appointed by the two Houses of Congress to consider the question raised by the resolution of the House, adopted on the 27th of January, 1871, directing the return to the Senate of Senate bill No. 1083, to repeal so much of the act approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes," as continues the income tax after the 31st day of December, 1869, with the suggestion that section 7 of Article I of the Constitution vests in the House of Representatives the sole power to originate such measures; and by the resolution of the Senate of February 1, 1871, returning said bill to the House, report:

"That, having met, after full and free conference, the joint committee have been unable to agree.

"The managers upon the part of the House of Representatives, Messrs. Hooper, ALLISON, and Voorhees, maintained "that, according to the true intent and meaning of the Constitution, it is the right of the House of Representatives to originate all bills relating directly to taxation, including all bills imposing or remitting taxes; and that, in the exercise of that right, the House of Representatives shall decide the manner and time of the imposition and remission of all taxes, subject to the right of the Senate to amend any of such bills, originating in the House, before such bills have become a law."

"The managers upon the part of the Senate maintained 'that, according to the true intent and meaning of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution, "bills for raising revenue" are those bills only the direct purpose of which is to raise revenue by laying and collecting taxes, duties, imposts, or excises, and that a bill may originate in the Senate to repeal a law or portion of a law which imposes taxes, duties, imposts. or excises.'

"In advising adherence to the position taken by the managers upon the part of the Senate, they deem it a proper occasion to present the reasons which, in their opinion, justify them in that advice.

"The words of the Constitution which are viewed in these opposite senses are as follows:

"'All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments, as on other bills.'

"In seeking for the meaning of this provision, we naturally look at the history and circumstances which preceded and attended its adoption, at the practice of Congress in its legislation under it, and at the construction which has been put upon it by commentators.

"The men who framed our Constitution were students of the unwritten constitution of England, and there can be no doubt that this provision is such a modification of the practice of the House of Commons, as to money bills, as they believed suited to the new Government they were then forming.

"That we may see clearly what that practice was, and the reasons which are assigned for it, we quote the words of Sir William Blackstone:

"'The peculiar laws and customs of the House of Commons relate principally to the raising of taxes and the elections of members to serve in Parliament:

"'First, with regard to taxes, it is the ancient, indisputable privilege and right of the House of Commons that all grants of subsidies or parliamentary aids do begin in their House, and are first bestowed by them; although their grants are not effectual, to all intents and purposes, until they have the assent of the other two branches of the Legislature. The general reason given for this exclusive privilege of the House of Commons is that the supplies are raised upon the body of the people, and therefore it is proper that they alone should have the right of taxing themselves. This reason would be unanswerable if the Commons taxed none but themselves; but it is notorious that a very large share of property is in the possession of the House of Lords; that this property is equally taxable, and taxed as the property of the Commons; and therefore, the Commons not being the sole persons taxed, this can not be the reason of their having the sole right of raising and modeling the supply. The true reason, arising from the spirit of our constitution, seems to be this: The Lords, being a permanent, hereditary body, created at pleasure by the King, are supposed more liable to be influenced by the Crown, and when once influenced to continue so, than the Commons, who are a temporary, elective body, freely nominated by the people. It would therefore be extremely dangerous to give the Lords any power of framing new taxes for the subject; it is sufficient that they have a power of rejecting, if they think the Commons too lavish or improvident in their grants. But so unreasonably jealous are the Commons of this valuable privilege that herein they will not suffer the other House to exert any power but that of rejecting; they will not permit the least alteration or amendment to be made by the Lords to the mode of taxing the people by a money bill; under which appellation are included all bills by which money is directed to be raised upon the subject, for any purpose or in any shape whatsoever; either for the exigencies of the Government, and collected from the Kingdom in general, as the land tax, or for private benefit, and collected in any particular district, as by turnpikes, parish rates, and the like.' (Blackstone's Commentaries, book 1, chapter 2, pp. 168, 169.)

"Money bills, in the practice of Parliament, embrace not only those by which money is directed to be raised, but also those by which supplies are granted, or what we term appropriation bills. Not only was the right claimed and exercised by the Commons to originate both these classes of bills, but finally, in 1678, their claim was urged so far as to exclude the Lords from all power of amending bills of supply. On the 3d of July in that year they resolved—

"'That all aids and supplies ought to begin with the Commons, and that it is the undoubted and sole right of the Commons to direct, limit, and appoint in such bill, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations, and qualifications of such grants, which ought not to be changed or altered by the House of Lords.' (May's Parliamentary Practice, p. 506, 507.)

"Bearing in mind the practice and the reasons for it, as given by Blackstone, we next come to consider the circumstances attendant upon the adoption of the clause of the Constitution, the true intent and meaning of which is the subject of disagreement between the House and the Senate.

"No question could have presented itself more forcibly to the minds of the members of the convention which framed the Constitution than that of taxation. The inability of the Confederation to enforce its requisitions for revenue upon the States was one of the leading causes, if not the leading cause, which led to the call for that convention.

"What light, then, do the proceedings which resulted in the adoption of he clause under consideration shed upon its meaning?

"That convention met on the 14th of May, 1787, but a majority of members did not appear until the 25th of that month.

"The first proposition bearing upon this question was offered immediately after the adoption of the rules for regulating the proceedings upon the 29th of May. It appears in the resolution offered by Edmund Randolph. The prior resolutions having provided for two branches of a National Legislature, the sixth reads thus:

"'That each branch ought to possess the right of originating acts.' (1 Elliott's Debates, p. 144.)

"In the draft of a Federal Government, submitted on the same day by Charles Pinckney, is this provision in Article III:

"'All money bills of every kind shall originate in the House of Delegates and shall not be altered by the Senate.' (Ibid., p. 146.)

"On the 31st of May the sixth resolution of Mr. Randolph was adopted. (Ibid., p. 153.)

"On the 13th of June Mr. Gerry moved to add the following words to the fifth resolution reported by the committee, being the sixth offered by Mr. Randolph (see p. 181), namely, 'excepting money bills which shall originate in the first branch of the National Legislature.' This was negatived—yeas 3, nays 8. (Ibid., p. 174.)

"On the 19th of June the committee of the whole reported on the resolutions submitted by Mr. Randolph, and the fifth resolution as reported by them is: 'That each branch ought to possess the right of originating acts.' (Ibid., p. 181.)

"On the 26th of June this passed unanimously. (Ibid., p. 191.)

"It was at this stage the convention reached the question of representation in the two branches of Congress; and as this is alleged to have entered into the final settlement of the question we are considering, it is proper it should be noticed.

"On the 2d of July a committee was elected by ballot, consisting of one member from each State, to whom the resolutions (the seventh and eighth) providing for representation were referred.

"On the 5th of July that committee recommended to the convention the following propositions:

"'1. That in the first branch of the Legislature each of the States now in the Union be allowed one member for every 40,000 inhabitants of the description reported in the seventh resolution of the Committee of the Whole House; that each State not containing that number shall be allowed one member; that all bills for raising or appropriating money, and for fixing the salaries of the officers of the Government of the United States, shall originate in the first branch of the Legislature, and shall not be altered or amended by the second branch; and that no money shall be drawn from the public Treasury but in pursuance of appropriations to be originated by the first branch.

"'2. That in the second branch of the Legislature each State shall have an equal vote.' (Ibid., p. 194.)

"On the 6th of July the first part of the first proposition was referred to a select committee, and that part providing for 'bills for raising or appropriating money,' etc., being submitted to a vote, was declared adopted, the vote standing thus: Yeas, 5 States; nays, 3 States; divided, 3 States. (Ibid., pp. 195-196.)

"On the 16th of July the whole subject of representation and money bills was embodied in a report which fixed the number of Representatives, provided that representation ought to be proportioned according to direct taxation, and for a census, gave each State equal representation in the Senate, and contained this provision:

"'Resolved, That all bills for raising or appropriating money, and for fixing the salaries of the officers of the Government of the United States, shall originate in the first branch of the Legislature of the United States, and shall not be altered or amended by the second branch; and that no money shall be drawn from the public Treasury but in pursuance of appropriations to be originated by the first branch.' (Ibid., pp. 205-206.)

"On the 26th of July all the propositions previously adopted were referred to the Committee of Detail. (Ibid., pp. 220-222.)

"On the 6th of August the committee reported a draft of a Constitution (p. 224), in which section 5 of Article IV is in the same words as the resolution above quoted from page 206. Section 12 of Article VI also reads: 'Each House shall possess the right of originating bills except in the cases before mentioned.'

"We now come to the point where the action was taken fixing the number of Representatives and Senators and striking out the fifth section of the fourth article, as before adopted. This action took place on the 8th of August. (Ibid., 232-234.) The section thus struck out was again moved on the 13th of August and rejected. (Ibid., p. 241.)

"It is stated in the Madison Papers (pp. 1268, 1297, 1306) that this was a motion to reconsider the rejection, and that it prevailed. The vote after reconsideration is given upon the separate propositions. (Ibid., p. 1316.)

"On the first part, as to the exclusive originating of money bills in the House, it stood—ayes 4, nays 7; on originating by the House and amending by the Senate—ayes 4, nays 7.

"On the last clause, as to drawing money on appropriations, which must originate in the House—ayes 1, nays 10.

"On the 15th of August this provision was again offered as an amendment to the twelfth section of the sixth article of reported draft, and its consideration was postponed. (1 Elliott's Debates, p. 243.)

"On the 5th of September the committee reported a substitute for the twelfth section of the sixth article, which, on the 8th of September, was adopted in the words which now make the seventh section of the first article, and upon the true meaning of which the House and Senate differ. (Ibid., 285, 295.)

"This may seem a tedious and perhaps unnecessary detail of the steps which preceded the adoption of this section. At the risk of this criticism, it has been given, as we desire by this history, and referring to the debates as given in the Madison Papers, but which we have not quoted, to show—

"First. That the convention started with the two opposite ideas before it, namely: 'That each House ought to possess the right of originating acts,' and 'that all money bills of every kind shall originate in the House of Delegates, and shall not be altered by the Senate.'

"Second. That until the question of representation in the Houses was reached, the first of these propositions was twice adopted, and the second, when presented as an amendment to the first, was rejected.

"Third. That the first time the limitation of the power of the Senate to originate bills of any class received the sanction of the convention was while the question of representation was unsettled and in the hands of a committee; and then, out of 11 States, but 5 voted for it, 3 being divided, and 3 voting no.

"Fourth. That when this limitation was reported back by the committee, accompanied by the fixing of the representation in the House and Senate, the vote stood—ayes 5, noes 4, divided 1.

"Fifth. That when it was thus adopted the original proposition of Mr. Randolph, that 'each House ought to possess the right of originating acts,' also stood as adopted.

"Sixth. That after the representation in the House and the Senate was fixed, those provisions before adopted, which required appropriation bills, and bills fixing salaries of officers, and denied the power of amendment to the Senate, were stricken out, and the efforts afterwards made to reinsert them failed.

"Seventh. That it was claimed in the Senate that section 5 of Article IV should have been retained with these limitations in it, because it was a compromise to secure the larger States against the imposition of taxes by bills originating in the Senate, where the States had equal representation; that, notwithstanding this, it was stricken out; and that of the five larger States to which this was considered applicable three of them had uniformly voted against all limitation on the power of the Senate. (Madison Papers, vol. 3, pp. 1266-1267, 1306-1316.)

"In the light of this history and summary, we place, in parallel columns, the section which was stricken out and the section as it was reported by the committee and adopted.

"STRICKEN OUT.	"AS ADOPTED.
"'All bills for raising or appropriating money and for fixing the salaries of the officers of the Government shall originate in the House of Representatives, and shall not be altered or amended by the Senate. No money shall be drawn from the public Treasury, but in pursuance of appropriations, which shall originate in the House of Representatives.'	"'All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills. No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law.'

"The first clause of the section as adopted is now the seventh section of the first article, the second clause being transferred by the revising committee to section 9. Before commenting upon the meaning of the clause as adopted, it is proper also to insert here the form of words which Mr. Randolph desired to use in reinserting the rejected clause:

"'Article IV, section 5, being reconsidered—

"'Mr. Randolph moved that the clause be altered so as to read: "bills for raising money for the purpose of revenue, or for appropriating the same, shall originate in the House of Representatives." (Madison Papers, pp. 1305-1306).

"The object of this amendment was declared to be to exclude the idea that the section extended to all bills which might incidentally affect the revenue. With all this in remembrance, the committee of revision reported the words as they now stand in section 7, article 1.

"Now, recurring to the section stricken out, and looking at the parts omitted, which are placed in italics, it will be apparent that the omission of the proposed restrictions upon the power of the Senate is equal to an express affirmation that the Senate has the power—

"First. To originate appropriation bills.

"Second. To originate bills for fixing the salaries of the officers of the Government, and, by way of emphasizing the fact, a reassertion.

"Third. That money may be drawn from the Treasury upon appropriations which do not originate in the House of Representatives.

"In view of this clear declaration of the intent of the framers of the Constitution, which would seem to leave no room for question as to the only power intended to be vested in the House to the exclusion of the Senate, let us see what has been the practice of Congress under it.

"And first, as to appropriation bills. It is true that the power to originate them is not in question now; but having shown, as we think clearly, that the Senate has that power, it is well to look at the extent to which this claim of exclusive right is pushed, how unfounded it is, and in what inconsistent positions the House has placed its own claim by its action. When we find it asserted in one instance and expressly repudiated in another, and when it is a claim made in derogation of the power of the Senate, this double construction should certainly excuse some doubt as to whether the claim is well established. And yet it is easy to demonstrate that the House has both asserted and denied that 'bills for raising revenue' include appropriation bills. Without enumerating the precedents to which we are referred, it is sufficient to say that the acts of the House upon amendments to its own bills, and upon those originating in the Senate, come in direct antagonism with each other. The claim has been that appropriation bills are revenue bills within the meaning of the Constitution. If an appropriation bill is one of that class, then no amendment which the Senate could add to it would be liable to objection, because the same clause of the Constitution which requires them to originate in the House expressly empowers the Senate to amend them, as it may amend other bills. If it is not one of that class required by the Constitution to originate in the House, then it is not a bill 'for raising revenue,' and may properly originate in the Senate.

"The Post-Office appropriation bill in the second session of the Thirty-fifth Congress originated in the House and the Senate added an amendment raising the rates of postage. When this was returned to the House Mr. GROW objected that 'said amendment is in the nature of a revenue bill.' (Congressional Globe, March 3, 1859, p. 1567.)

"The bill was returned to the Senate, and, the Senate adhereing to its view, it failed. This was a decision by the House that an appropriation bill is not a revenue bill; for if it were the amendment was within the power of the Senate.

"As to bills incidentally affecting the revenue, the compromise tariff of 1833, the resolution of Mr. McDuffie, in 1844, to substitute the duties of the compromise bill for those of the tariff of 1842, and the defeat of it, as also the action of the House upon the Treasury-note bill of the Senate in 1837, are referred to by the managers on the part of the House to sustain their position.

"As to the compromise bill, it is sufficient to say that upon its introduction into the Senate the point was made against its reception that it contained one section which increased duties on Kendall woolens, although all the other sections reduced duties; that the objector (Mr. Forsyth) agreed if that section were withdrawn the bill could properly be introduced in the Senate; that it was introduced notwithstanding that section was retained, and that the debate and action upon its reception and passage indicate the opinion of the Senate that a bill to reduce duties could originate in the Senate. This bill, although received and considered in the Senate, was not sent to House, as a bill in the same words was introduced there and passed to avoid this question, and the Senate passed it.

"The action in 1844, laying upon the table Mr. McDuffie's resolution, indicates a different opinion; but neither of these cases is at all parallel to the case in hand. It will also be noted that the Senate, which was favorable to Mr. Clay's bill, received it as a proper measure to originate in that body, and that the Senate, which laid Mr. McDuffie's resolution upon the table, was opposed to the measure it proposed. It is probable the precedents lose some of their value from these facts, when quoted upon a question of constitutional law. The loan bill of last season is sufficient answer to the precedent of the Treasury-note bill without entering into an examination of the power under the Constitution to borrow money. The question might well be raised whether the Senate has the power to originate a bill establishing a different mode of taxation or a different scale of duties, even if they are reductions of the existing taxes and duties; for, whether it be more or less, a tax or duty imposed does raise revenue; but it seems to be a contradiction in terms to say that a bill to repeal a special tax altogether, and thus prevent the collection of revenue from that source, is a bill for raising revenue. That the repeal may necessitate the imposition of other taxes is no argument against the power to introduce such a bill. It would be equally good against the power to originate a bill fixing the salaries of officers of Government, for every increase in these salaries necessitates additional taxation; and yet we think it has been shown that this power is undoubtedly possessed by the Senate.

"Besides, the repeal of the tax can not be accomplished without the concurrence of the representatives of the people, who will then have the determination of whether it does require other taxes to be laid, and if it does, what these taxes shall be. Thus no safeguard of the people is taken away by the exercise of this power by the Senate.

"Again, if, as contended, the clause was intended as a protection to the larger States against the imposition of taxes by origination in the Senate, where each State has equal representation, how is this security affected by permitting the Senate to originate a measure for relief from that taxation which has already originated in the House? If the larger States can, by originating tax laws in the House, do injustice to the smaller ones, which have fewer Representatives, may not the smaller States, through the Senate, where each State is equal, at least make the effort to procure justice from the House, by sending it a measure for repeal?

"That no such view as that now taken has ever heretofore been seriously urged may fairly be inferred from the following list of laws upon the statute books, all of which originated in the Senate, and, as will be seen by their titles, much more nearly approach the character of revenue measures than does the bill for the repeal of the income tax.

"Others of similar character might doubtless be referred to if time permitted a more extended examination of the Journals, but these, beginning in 1815, and coming down to the session of 1870, will suffice to show the acquiescence of Congress in the power now questioned:

"First. To repeal so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels and on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States as imposes discriminating duties. (Statutes, vol. 3, p. 224, ch. 77. March 3, 1815.)

"Second. To continue in force the second section of the act supplementary to an act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage. (Statutes, vol. 3, p. 369, ch. 50. March 3, 1817.)

"Third. To continue in force act passed 20th of May, 1818, supplementary to the act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, passed March 2, 1799. (Statutes, vol. 3, p. 563, ch. 44. April 18, 1820.)

"Fourth. To equalize the duties on vessels of the Republic of Colombia and their cargoes. (Vol. 4, p. 154, ch. 26. April 20, 1826.)

"Fifth. In addition to an act concerning discriminating duties of tonnage and imports, and to equalize the duties on Prussian vessels and their cargoes. (Vol. 4, p. 308, ch. 11. May 24, 1828.)

"Sixth. To repeal the tonnage duties upon ships and vessels of the United States, and upon certain foreign vessels. (Vol. 4, p. 425, ch. 219. May 31, 1830.)

"Seventh. To explain and amend the eighteenth section of the act of July 14, 1832, to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports. (Vol. 4, p. 635, ch. 58. March 2, 1833.)

"Eighth. An act concerning the duties on lead. (Vol. 4, p. 717, ch. 139. June 30, 1834.)

"Ninth. Further to suspend the operation of certain provisos to an act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports, approved July 14, 1832. (Vol. 4, p. 778, ch. 44. March 3, 1835.)

"Tenth. To suspend the discriminating duties upon goods imported in vessels of Portugal, and to reduce the duties on wines. (Statutes, vol. 5, p. 725, ch. 359. July 4. 1836.)

"Eleventh. Explanatory of an act to release from duty iron prepared for and actually laid on railways and inclined planes. (Statutes, vol. 5, p. 61, ch. 233. July 1, 1836.)

"Twelfth. An act regulating commercial intercourse with the port of Cayenne, in the colony of French Guiana, and to remit certain duties. (Statutes, vol. 5, p. 489. June 1, 1842.)

"Thirteenth. To reduce the rates of postage, to limit the use and correct the abuse of the franking privilege, and for prevention of frauds on the revenues of the Post-Office Department. (Statutes, vol. 5, p. 732, ch. 43. March 3, 1845.)

"Fourteenth. An act reducing the duty on imports, and for other purposes. (Statutes, vol. 11, p. 192, ch. 98. March 3, 1857.)

"Fifteenth. Supplementary to act to authorize a national loan, and for other purposes. (Statutes, vol. 12, p. 313, ch. 46. August 5, 1846.)

"Sixteenth. An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt. (Statutes of second session, Forty-first Congress, p. 272. July 14, 1870.)

"Having examined the adoption of this clause of the Constitution and the practice under it, let us now look at the construction which has been put upon it by commentators and others of authority. In aiding us to construe it we quote what Gouverneur Morris, one of that committee of revision, says in his remarkable letter to Timothy Pickering, written in 1814:

"'What can a history of the Constitution avail toward interpreting its provisions? This must be done by comparing the plain import of the words with the general tenor and object of the instrument. That instrument was written by the fingers which write this letter. Having rejected redundant and equivocal terms, I believe it to be as clear as our language would permit, excepting, nevertheless, a part of what relates to the judiciary.'

"If the language had been, 'all bills for the purpose of raising revenue,' it would hardly be contended that the plain import of these words would include not only a bill to appropriate revenue, but also one to repeal an act which had for its purpose the raising of revenue. And yet if these words had been inserted, it is submitted they would have been considered redundant, and stricken out. The words now used convey the same meaning as if Mr. Randolph's amendment had been adopted, the term "revenue" being substituted for money. A bill for raising revenue, in the plain import of the words, means a bill which intends to have, and will have, the effect of raising revenue; not of raising in the sense of increasing, but of producing, yielding revenue, and putting it into the Treasury.

"George Mason, in assigning his reasons for not signing the Constitution (1 Elliot's Debates, p. 494), says:

"'The Senate have the power of altering all money bills and of originating appropriations of money and the salaries of the officers of their own appointment, in conjunction with the President of the United States, although they are not the representatives of the people or amenable to them.'"

"Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, after reviewing the practice as to money bills in the British Parliament and the history of the clause in our Constitution, says:

"'What bills are properly bills for raising revenue in the sense of the Constitution has been matter of some discussion. A learned commentator supposes that every bill which indirectly or consequentially may raise revenue is within the sense of the Constitution a revenue bill. He therefore thinks that the bills for establishing the post-office and the mint and regulating the value of foreign coins belong to this class and ought not to have originated, as in fact they did, in the Senate. (1 Tucker's Black. Com., appendix 261 and note.) But the practical construction of the Constitution has been against his opinion; and, indeed, the history of the origin of the power already suggested abundantly proves that it has been confined to bills to levy taxes in the strict sense of the words and has not been understood to extend to bills for other purposes which may incidentally create revenue. No one supposes that a bill to sell any of the public lands or to sell the public stock is a bill to raise revenue in the sense of the Constitution. Much less would a bill be so deemed which merely regulated the value of foreign or domestic coins or authorized a discharge of insolvent debtors upon assignments of their estates to the United States, giving a priority of payment to the United States in cases of insolvency, although all of them might incidentally bring revenue into the Treasury.' (Section 877.)

"The same view is taken in Bouvier's Law Dictionary, title 'Money bills.' Rawle, in his view of the Constitution (page 60) questions the policy or necessity of this exemption, but says 'It was probably supposed that the members of the House of Representatives, coming more frequently from the body of the people and from their numbers, combining greater variety of character and employment, would be well qualified to judge not only of the necessity but also of the methods of raising revenue. On all other subjects a bill may originate in either House.'

"Curtis, in his History of the Constitution, considers that the adoption of this clause was influenced by the settlement of the mode of electing the President, in case of failure to choose by the electors. He says:

"'To this great influence [that of electing the President by the Senate] many members from the larger States desired, naturally, to add the privilege of confining the origin of revenue bills to the House of Representatives. They found in the committee some members from the smaller States willing to concede this privilege, as the price of an ultimate election of the Executive by the Senate, and of other arrangements which tended to elevate the tone of the Government by increasing the power and influence of the Senate. They found others also who approved of it upon principle. The compromise was accordingly effected in the committee, and in this attitude the question concerning the revenue bills again came before the convention.

"'But there, a scheme that seemed likely to elevate the Senate into a powerful oligarchy, and that would certainly put it in the power of seven States, not containing a third of the people, to elect the Executive, when there failed to be a choice by the electors, met with strenuous resistance. For these and other reasons not necessary to be recounted here, the ultimate choice of the Executive was transferred from the Senate to the House of Representatives. This change, if coupled with the concession of revenue bills to the House, without the right to amend in the Senate, would have thrown a large balance of power into the former assembly; and, in order to prevent this inequality, a provision was made, in the words used in the constitution of Massachusetts, that the Senate might propose or concur with amendments, as on other bills. With this addition the restriction of the origin of bills for raising revenue to the House of Representatives finally passed with but two dissentient votes.' (Vol. 2, pp. 221-222.)

"Adding as a footnote:

"'The history of this provision shows clearly that a bill for appropriating money may originate in the Senate.'

"The only authority quoted as directly asserting the view now taken by the House managers is Tucker's Blackstone (vol. 1, p. 195) and note in appendix (p. 261).

"The first reference we find to be a discussion, not of this clause of the Constitution, but of the equality of representation in the Senate, and, taken all together, does not sustain the position for which it is quoted. It reads thus:

"'As States, then, Rhode Island and Delaware are entitled to an equal weight in council on all occasions where that weight does not impose a burden upon the other States in the Union. Now, as the relation between taxation and representation in one branch of the legislature was fixed by an invariable standard, and as that branch of the legislature possesses the exclusive right of originating bills on the subject of revenue, the undue weight of the smaller States is guarded against effectually in the imposition of burdens. In all other cases their interests as States are equal and deserve equal attention from the Confederate government. This could no way be so effectually provided for as in giving them equal weight in the second branch of the legislature and in the Executive, whose province it is to make treaties, etc. Without this equality somewhere the Union could not, under any possible view, have been considered as an equal alliance between equal States. The disparity which must have prevailed had the apportionment of representation been the same in the Senate as in the other House would have been such as to have submitted the smaller States to the most debasing dependence. I can not, therefore, but regard this particular in the Constitution as one of the happiest traits in it, and calculated to cement the Union equally with any other provision that it contains.'

"On page 261 is a discussion of the power to coin money, and in a note the opinion of the annotator is shown to be contrary to the practice of the Government in its early history. We give it in full. Speaking of the bill which allowed a charge for coinage at the Mint, he says:

"'Consequently, every bill for this purpose, or for any other by which a revenue may be raised, should originate in the House of Representatives. Yet I am very much mistaken if a recurrence to the early Journals of the Senate of the United States would not prove that the several acts for establishing the Post-Office, for regulating the value of foreign coins, and for establishing a Mint all originated in the Senate. The reason for the acquiescence of the House of Representatives on these occasions probably was that no revenue was intended to be drawn to the Government by these laws, whereas, strictly speaking, a revenue is raised by the act establishing the Mint (2 Cong., c. 16, sec. 14) equal to one-half per cent, as an indemnification to the Mint for the coinage; and in the case of the bill for establishing the Post-Office, there can be no room to doubt that it operates as a revenue law, and that to a very considerable amount.'

"To show, however, the same author's view of the clause now under consideration, we quote him on page 215:

"'In the course of this parallel we have seen that every deviation in the Constitution of the United States from that of Great Britain has been attended with a decided advantage and superiority on the part of the former. We shall perhaps discover, before we dismiss the comparison between them, that all its defects arise from some degree of approximation to the nature of the British Government.

"'The exclusive privileges of the House of Commons and of our House of Representatives, with some small variations, are the same. The first relates to money bills, in which no amendment is permitted to be made by the House of Lords, is modified by our Constitution so as to give the Senate a concurrent right in every respect, except in the power of originating them, and this upon very proper principles—the Senators not being distinguished from their fellow-citizens by any exclusive privileges, and being, in fact, the representatives of the people, though chosen in a different manner from the members of the other House, no good reason could be assigned why they should not have a voice on the several parts of the revenue bill, as well as on the whole taken together.'

"Without extending these quotations further, we may safely say, not only that the legal authorities sustain the position taken by the managers on the part of the Senate, but many of them point out also the dissimilarity between our Government and that from which this restriction was borrowed, and that the provision is a remnant of English law and custom not in harmony with our institutions.

"The grant of the power of amendment was a surrender of the whole principle, for the power of amendment has no limit. If the House proposes to tax at one rate, the Senate may amend to another—lesser or greater. To any bill for raising revenue they may add amendments which increase or diminish burdens; which select new objects of taxation, or omit those proposed by the House. If they increase salaries or make appropriations, taxation may be necessary to pay them if the House concur. So, if they propose to repeal the income tax, can more be said than that other taxes may be necessary, or may not be? Is the power to depend upon such a contingency? If so, where does this limitation stop?

"As Congress can exercise only the powers granted, and such powers as are necessary to carry them into effect, is it not reasonable to say that when one branch of Congress claims any power to the exclusion of the other branch that exclusion should be as plainly written as an express grant of power? Brought to that test it will be hard to find such exclusion of the power to repeal a law in the words 'all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives.'

"Looking at the origin and history of this clause, at the constant and unquestioned practice under it in the passage of so many laws which may affect revenue, at the preponderance of legal authority in construing it, and at the manifest difference between the structure and powers of our Government and those of the British Government, upon whose practice this distinction is sought to be established, we can not doubt that the Senate had the power to originate the bill which has given rise to this question; and, so considering, we do not think further conference necessary.

ANTHRACITE COAL.

Affirmed by circuit court, northern district of California (93 Fed. Rep., 954).
Also by circuit court of appeals (100 Fed., 442).

Anthracite coal containing less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon not free as anthracite coal not specially provided for under paragraph 523, act of July 24, 1897, but dutiable under paragraph 415 of said act.

Before the United States General Appraisers at New York, January 17, 1898.

In the matter of the protest, 34216 b-4075, of Chas. P. Coles, against the decision of the collector of customs at San Francisco as to the rate and amount of duties chargeable on certain coal, imported per Muskoka, and entered August 3, 1897.

Opinion by Tichenor, general appraiser.

This protest is against the assessment of duty at 67 cents per ton, under paragraph 415 of the act of July 24, 1897, upon an importation which is described in the invoice as "Abercrave best large double-screened anthracite coals," and was returned by the appraiser as "Coal containing less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon," the protestant claiming that it is entitled to admission free of duty under paragraph 523 of said act.

It appears from the report of analysis of the official sample, made by the examiner of drugs at the port of San Francisco, that the merchandise in question contained: Ash, 2.08 per cent; moisture, 1.17 per cent; volatile matter, 7.03 per cent, and fixed carbon, 89.72 per cent.

It is disputed by the protestant that the coal contained less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon. His contention is to the effect that, as anthracite coal is provided for eo nomine in paragraph 523, and is not specifically named in paragraph 415 of the new tariff act, the first-mentioned provision prevails. The pertinent provisions in the two paragraphs mentioned are as follows:

"Par. 415. Coal, bituminous, and all coals containing less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon, and shale, 67 cents per ton of 28 bushels, 80 pounds to the bushel."

"Par. 523. Coal, anthracite, not specially provided for in this act."

Properly construed, the provision last quoted exempts from duty only such anthracite coal as contains 92 per cent or more of fixed carbon, as the provision cited in paragraph 415 clearly applies to all anthracite coal containing less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon. In other words, the two provisions may be fairly paraphrased so as to read:

"Par. 415. Coal, bituminous, and shale, and all anthracite and other coals containing less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon, 67 cents per ton," etc.

"Par. 523. Coal, anthracite, containing 92 per cent or more of fixed carbon."

This interpretation of the language of the provisions manifestly expresses the intention of the framers of the act and renders it unnecessary to look elsewhere for the legislative intent. However, a comparison of the corresponding provisions of previous tariff acts emphasizes this view of the purpose of the Congress in the premises.

Paragraphs 318 and 441 of the tariff act of August 28, 1894, contained these provisions respecting coals:

"Coal, bituminous, and shale, 40 cents per ton."

"Coal, anthracite (free)."

The language respecting bituminous coal and shale is substantially the same (except as to rate of duty) as was used in the different tariff acts as far back at least as June 30, 1864, and that relating to anthracite coal is identical with that in the different general tariff acts since the act of July 14, 1870, in which it was transferred from the dutiable to the free list.

If the framers of the present act had not intended any change with respect to coals other than in the dutiable rate, they would doubtless have adopted the descriptive language of the previous acts, in accordance with the long-established usage. In other words, if no change was intended, why add, in paragraph 415, the radically different language, "and all coals containing less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon," and in paragraph 523, the important qualifying words "not specially provided for in this act?" (Greenleaf v. Goodrich, 101 U. S., 281.) The protestant's contention could not be sustained unless these new provisions were treated as meaningless.

By reference to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, under date of June 30, 1897 (pp. 2496-2502), it will be seen that the proposition to impose a duty of 67 cents per ton on "all coals containing 92 per cent of fixed carbon" was expressly intended to cover anthracite coal. The discussion (in which Senators ALLISON, Allen, VEST, White, PERKINS, and others participated) was with that distinct understanding, as clearly appears from the following excerpts:

"Mr. VEST. Mr. President, as I understand this proposed amendment, it makes an entire revolution in the taxation upon coal. It puts anthracite coal upon the dutiable list, although a cursory examination of the paragraph would not leave that impression. I have not the amendment before me, but my recollection of it is that there is a duty of 67 cents upon all bituminous coal, and all coal having less than 92 per cent of carbon, which would include anthracite coal.

"Mr. ALLISON. On coal containing less than 92 per cent of carbon the duty proposed is 67 cents per ton.

Mr. VEST. That puts a duty upon anthracite coal. Mr. President, I wish to inquire, if I may respectfully, why this duty is imposed? According to the statistics of imports and exports, we exported from this country in 1896 $5,717,246 worth of anthracite coal, and we imported in all $345,963 worth. I should like to inquire, if we exported from the country nearly $6,000,000 worth of anthracite and brought in about $350,000 worth, why we should put this duty upon anthracite coal?"

The protest is overruled, and the assessment of duty affirmed.

COLES V. COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS FOR PORT OF SAN FRANCISCO.

[Circuit court of appeals, ninth circuit, February 5, 1900.]

No. 530. Customs duties—Classification—Anthracite coal.

Anthracite coal, containing less than 92 per centum of fixed carbon, is within the provision of paragraph 415 of the tariff act of 1897, which imposes a duty on "coal, bituminous, and all coals containing less than 92 per centum of fixed carbon," and is not entitled to free entry under paragraph 523, in the free list, which includes "coal, anthracite, not specially provided for in this act."

Appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of California.

Sidney V. Smith for appellant.

Marshal B. Woodworth, assistant United States attorney (Frank L. Coombs, United States attorney of counsel), for appellee.

Before Gilbert and Ross, circuit judges, and Hawley, district judge.

Hawley, district judge. This is an appeal from the judgment of the circuit court (93 Fed., 954), sustaining the decision of the board of United States general appraisers, that a cargo of anthracite coal imported from Wales into the port of San Francisco, Cal., which contained "less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon," was subject to duty at the rate of 67 cents per ton, as provided by paragraph 415 of the act of July 24, 1897, entitled "An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States" (30 Stat., 152-190), commonly known as the "Dingley tariff act." The contention of the appellant is that the decision of the appraisers and the judgment of the circuit court affirming it are erroneous in this: That anthracite coal is to be admitted free under paragraph 523 (30 Stat., 197). It is admitted that the coal in question is anthracite, and contains less than 92 per cent fixed carbon. The respective paragraphs read as follows:

"(415) Coal, bituminous, and all coals containing less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon, and shale, 67 cents per ton of 28 bushels, 80 pounds to the bushel." "(523) Coal, anthracite, not specially provided for in this act."

The ordinary and plain meaning of these paragraphs would seem to leave no doubt as to their proper construction. Read in pari materia they are susceptible of but one meaning. Paragraph 415 provides a duty for all coals containing less than 92 per cent fixed carbon. There is no exception stated, and no reference made to other provisions of the act. There is no ambiguity or uncertainty in the language used. Paragraph 523 "Coal, anthracite, not specially provided for in this act" is placed on the free list but turning back to paragraph 415, it will be seen that all coal (which includes anthracite) that contains "less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon" is "specially provided for in this act;" and this paragraph therefore only applies to coal, anthracite, which contains 92 per cent or more of fixed carbon. There is no conflict between the two paragraphs. No words have to be interjected into either to make them clear, plain, and consistent with each other. It is a cardinal rule of construction that, if the language used is so clear as to admit of but one meaning, there is no room for any other construction. It is never allowable to interpret a paragraph or section which has no need of interpretation. To undertake a departure from the language used would, in fact, be an unjustifiable assumption by the court of legislative power.

It is the duty of the court, where the language is free from doubt or uncertainty, to confine itself to the words of the legislative body that enacted the law, without adding anything thereto or subtracting anything therefrom. These general principles are too well settled to require any reference to the numerous authorities upon this subject. If applicable to the present case, it necessarily follows that the judgment of the circuit court was correct. But the learned counsel for appellant has ingeniously and ably attacked this position, and, in apparent candor and with great earnestness, contends that the respective paragraphs are clearly susceptible of another meaning, and that it is apparent that the conclusions reached by the court are manifestly unsound and erroneous and contrary to the plain intent of Congress in passing the act in question. It would, indeed, be difficult for the legislative body to so frame a tariff act as to prevent any controversy as to its meaning upon the part of opposing counsel. It is always easy to "pick flaws" and "catch at straws," and make suggestions that, if the statute meant what is claimed for it by the opposing side, it is reasonable to believe that different language would have been used. (In re Wise (C. C.) 93 Fed., 443, 445.) It is sometimes difficult to answer these suggestions. The fact is that it is often unnecessary to do so, because the duty of courts, in the interpretation of statutes, is often fully accomplished by bringing sense out of the words used in the statute without attempting to use other words to bring sense into it.

In all cases where there is any ambiguity, doubt, or uncertainty, or where it is evident that the literal meaning of the words used would be inconsistent with or directly opposite to the policy, object, and purpose which the framers of the statute had in view in enacting it, great latitude is allowed in their interpretation. The rule is universal that in the exposition of a statute the intention of the lawmaker will prevail over the literal sense of the terms, and its reason and intention will prevail over the strict letter. When the words are not explicit the intention is to be collected from the context, from the occasion and necessity of the laws, from the mischief and the remedy in view; and the intention is to be taken or presumed according to what is consonant with sound reason and judicial discretion. But courts are not authorized to imagine an intent contrary to the ordinary meaning of the words used, and then seek to bind the letter of the act to that intent by arbitrarily striking out, inserting, or remodeling the language of the act for the purpose of making it express such intent.

The customs duties imposed by the tariff act are varied and extensive. They necessarily cover a great variety of articles classified under different heads. It often happens that in certain paragraphs there are certain mixed articles named, descriptive in their general character, and in other parts of the act there are other paragraphs containing other descriptions which might, if they stood alone, be sufficient to cover the same articles that are in the other paragraphs, either generally or specifically described. In the light afforded by this condition of affairs, appellant argues that the words "containing less than 92 per centum of fixed carbon," in paragraph 415, are not a specific description of any kind of coal, and cites authorities to the effect that when an article is designated by a specific name, and a duty imposed upon it by such name, general terms in another part of the act, although sufficiently broad to comprehend such article, are not applicable to it, and contends that, inasmuch as anthracite coal is specifically designated by name in paragraph 523, it should be admitted free of duty, without regard to the question whether it contains more or less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon, and that paragraph 415 should therefore be read: "All coals containing less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon, except anthracite coal, must pay duty."

This position would be materially strengthened if the facts were as counsel asserts, that "anthracite is specifically designated, without qualification, in the free list." But the fact is that it is not so designated. Anthracite coal is, it is true, specifically named; but it is to be admitted free, subject to the qualifying clause, "not specifically provided for in this act." This materially changes the meaning that might otherwise be attributed to it if this qualification had not been added. Appellant, however, argues that the added words do not modify the word "anthracite," and that there are no other provisions in the act specially providing for "anthracite" by name. It is not denied that anthracite is coal, and that the words "all coal" in paragraph 415 would, if standing alone, without reference to paragraph 523, include anthracite coal; but this is met by the statement of appellant that, in order to make the respective paragraphs harmonize from his standpoint, the words "except anthracite" must be injected into paragraph 415. But, if the court can not see its way clear to amend that paragraph as suggested, counsel claims that the words in paragraph 523, "not specially provided for in this act," should be either omitted from the act or entirely disregarded by the court, in order that that paragraph might fully harmonize with paragraph 415 as amended in the manner contended for by him.

We are asked to disregard these words because it may be that they were simply thrown in, as was said by the Supreme Court in Smythe v. Fiske (23 Wall., 381; 23 L. Ed., 49), "out of abundant caution," and that there was nothing for the sentence to operate on, because anthracite coal was not specifically mentioned or provided for by any other paragraph or section of the act. If "all coal" were not comprehensive enough to include anthracite as well as any other kind of coal, whether specifically named or not, appellant's position might be sustained, but we are unwilling to give such a construction to the act, because it would necessarily imply that Congress did not understand the plain meaning of the words "all coal" contained in the paragraph in question. The words "out of abundant caution," as used in Smythe v. Fiske, do not imply that the sentence "not otherwise provided for" should be discarded in the interpretation of the different paragraphs or sections of the act; but, on the contrary, the opinion of the court clearly shows that the sentence must be given effect, and that its meaning should be interpreted in accordance with the legislative intent.

The opinion, in so far as it is applicable to this case, tends strongly to support the views we have expressed. There the question under consideration was whether the duty on silk neckties was to be governed by the eighth section of the supplemental act of June 30, 1864, or by the provisions of the acts of 1861 and 1862. The last clause of the eighth section of the act of 1864 reads as follows: "On all manufactures of silk or of which silk is the component material of chief value, not otherwise provided for." The circuit judge held that silk neckties came within the last clause of the eighth section of the act of June 30, 1864, unless the words "not otherwise provided for" excluded them from it, and brought them within the acts of 1861 and 1862, which provided for a less duty, and instructed the jury that this phrase referred, not to the preceding part of the eighth section of 1864, but to the prior acts of 1861 and 1862. The Supreme Court said:

"We agree with him as to the comprehensive character of the previous part of the sentence, if unqualified, but we dissent from his second proposition. To the latter we think there is a conclusive answer. The object of the statute was to increase the duties before imposed upon the things which it embraces. The title and the context alike show this. The preceding part of the section contains a very full enumeration of articles of silk, both manufactured and unmanufactured. It was evidently intended to be exhaustive. The last clause seems to have been added, as it is not unusual in such cases, out of abundant caution, that nothing might escape. Hence the phrase 'not otherwise provided for' was interposed and meant to apply, not to preceding acts which may not have been present to the mind of the draftsman, and to which there was no necessity to recur, but to the preceding enumeration in the same section, which is supplemented. The section, thus construing this clause, covers the whole subject of silk in all its variety of forms. It was complete in itself. There was no need to refer generally or specially to any prior act." (See also Movius v. Arthur, 95 U. S., 144, 147, 24 L. Ed., 420; Solomon v. Arthur, 102 U. S., 208, 212, 26 L. Ed., 147.)

The clause in question is made in the present case absolutely clear by adding, perhaps out of abundant caution, the words "in this act," so that no contention could possibly be made that it applied to any other act.

There is another canon of construction, which, if strictly observed, leads with unerring certainty to the conclusion that the paragraphs in question mean just what the language thereof naturally imports. "The intention of the lawmakers is the law." There are different methods of arriving at this intention. A comparison of former legislation upon the same subject may be made for the purpose of ascertaining whether the general object and purposes of the previous tariff legislation have been departed from or adhered to, and the views expressed by the members of Congress may be examined for the purpose of shedding light upon the question, if it is involved in any substantial doubt. The circuit court, in re Coles (93 Fed., 954 956), reviewed at length the statutes relative to duty on coal from 1789 up to the passage of the Dingley Act of July 24, 1897. Reference to this opinion shows that previous to the act of July 14, 1870 (16 Stat., 256, 266), which was an act to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes, "coal, anthracite," has never been specifically mentioned in any tariff act. For over eighty years it had been subject to duty as other coal. By the act of 1870 "coal, anthracite," was placed on the free list; and with the exception of the act of June 6, 1872 (17 Stat., 250), where no mention is made of anthracite, it appears in the various subsequent acts on the free list as "coal, anthracite." It had been on the free list for over twenty years prior to the passage of the Dingley Act, under consideration. It thus affirmatively appears that the language used in paragraph 415 of the act in question is, as stated by the circuit court, "a departure from that of all previous sections of the law upon this subject, and distinctly provides that all coals containing less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon should be subject to a duty of 67 cents per ton." The same view was taken by the general appraisers:

"If the framers of the present act had not intended any change with respect to coals, other than in the dutiable rate, they would doubtless adopt the descriptive language of the previous acts, in accordance with the long-established usage. In other words, if no change was intended, why add, in paragraph 415, the radically different language, 'and all coals containing less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon,' and in paragraph 523 the important qualifying words, 'not specially provided for in this act?' (Greenleaf v. Goodrich, 101 U. S., 281; 25 L. Ed., 845.) The protestant's contention could not be sustained unless these new provisions were treated as meaningless."

The board also referred to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, under date of June 30, 1897 (volume 30, part 2, Fifty-fifth Congress, first session, p. 2146), from which it clearly appears that the imposition of the duty at 67 cents per ton on "all coal containing less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon" was expressly intended by the lawmakers to cover anthracite as well as bituminous coal.

"Mr. VEST. Mr. President, as I understand this proposed amendment, it makes an entire revolution in the taxation upon coal. It puts anthracite coal upon the dutiable list, although a cursory examination of the paragraph would not leave that impression. I have not the amendment before me, but my recollection of it is that there is a duty of 67 cents upon all bituminous coal, and all coal having less than 92 per cent carbon, which would include anthracite coal.

"Mr. ALLISON. On coal containing less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon, the duty proposed is 67 cents a ton.

"Mr. VEST. That puts a duty upon anthracite coal."

From whatever legal standpoint that can possibly be taken, under any authorized rules of construction of the provisions of the Dingley Act, the conclusion is irresistable that Congress intended that the respective paragraphs should be read just as they are written; and, so read, they are not susceptible of any other construction than that first given in this opinion.

But there is still another point, pressed by appellant with seeming confidence, that demands notice. The court below found that:

"All cargoes of coal whatever, including all cargoes of anthracite coals as they come from the mine, or are loaded or imported in ships or dealt in commercially, contain less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon, although sample lumps for custom-house, picked at random from such imported cargoes, have averaged as high as 94 per cent in fixed carbon."

And it is claimed that under such facts it would convict Congress of an absurdity to hold that it meant that no anthracite coal should be admitted free, and that such would be the effect if the paragraphs are interpreted according to their plain meaning. The finding relied upon was not upon the material question involved in this proceeding. The controlling question was as to the percentage of fixed carbon which the cargo of coal in question contained. The court found that it was less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon. Notwithstanding the testimony offered in this particular case, and which was to some extent conflicting, we must presume that Congress acted intelligently, with full knowledge of all the facts; for it would be absurd for the court to presume that Congress did not know what it was doing when it passed the act in question.

If it be true, as appellant claims, that no anthracite coal exceeds per centum on which the duty is imposed, then the argument here made should be addressed to Congress instead of to the courts. We do not make the law, nor have we any right to amend it; and it is not within our province to question its wisdom, policy, or expediency. These are matters that belong to an entirely separate department of the Government. Our duty is accomplished when we judicially determine the interpretation of the language used by the lawmaking power. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed, with costs. (Coles v. Collector of Customs for port of San Francisco, 100 Fed. Rep., p. 442.)

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. HOAR submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 to enable the Director of the Census to collect and report to Congress the statistics of and relating to marriage and divorce in the several States and Territories and in the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas submitted an amendment relating to the compilation and publication of a complete roster of the officers and enlisted men of the Union and Confederate armies, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Subsequently Mr. JONES of Arkansas reported the foregoing amendment from the Committee on Printing favorably, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 11576) granting permission to Capt. B. H. McCalla and others to accept presents and decorations tendered to them by the Emperor of Germany and others; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000 to pay De B. Randolph Keim for services rendered in connection with the compilation of "A Pronouncing Gazetteer and Geographical Dictionary of the Philippine Islands of the United States of America," intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,000 to purchase portraits of the late Senators Allen G. Thurman and Simon Cameron, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRYE submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the salary of the United States consul at Sydney, Nova Scotia, from $1,500 to $2,000 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying paper, was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign relations.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $150,000 for improving the harbor of San Luis d'Apra, island of Guam, intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REGULATION OF TRUSTS OR CORPORATIONS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 6659) for the regulation of trusts or corporations engaged in international or interstate commerce be printed to the extent of a thousand copies, to be put in the document room for the use of Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MARY T. ULLMAN.

Mr. KEAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Mary T. Ullman, only child of Vincent Ullman, late a carpenter in the Senate of the United States, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his demise, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secrectaries, announced that the President had on the 12th instant approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. 2935) granting a pension to Joanna Rommel;

An act (S. 3212) granting a pension to Ellen A. Sager;

An act (S. 4355) authorizing the issuance of a patent to the county of Clallam, State of Washington;

An act (S. 4454) granting an increase of pension to John D. Sullivan;

An act (S. 5321) granting a pension to Rebecca H. Geyer;

An act (S. 5913) granting a pension to Cherstin Mattson; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 57) relating to military badges.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on this day approved and signed the act (S. 4083) for the relief of Surg. John F. Bransford, United States Navy.

EFFICIENCY OF THE MILITIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, before the resolution is presented, I desire the attention of the Senate for a moment.

As a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, it has devolved upon me to call the attention of the Senate to the bill known as the militia bill. In the interest of the proper consideration and advancement of that important measure I desire to ask unanimous consent that the bill known as the militia bill may be taken up to-morrow immediately after the routine business of the morning hour, and that a vote may be taken upon the bill and the pending amendments on the 20th day of January, a week from to-day, at 11 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I did not hear the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the routine business is completed, the bill known as the militia bill may be taken up for consideration, and that on the 20th day of January—the Chair understood the Senator from Wisconsin to say at 11 o'clock——

Mr. QUARLES. I will change the hour to 1 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And that on the 20th day of January, at 1 o'clock, a vote may be taken without further debate upon the bill and all pending amendments and amendments then offered. Is there objection?

Mr. QUAY. I object for the present, Mr. President. One reason for objecting is that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] has given notice that immediately after the conclusion of the routine business to-morrow he will proceed to address the Senate on the statehood bill.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I would not allow that to stand in the way of the consideration of the militia bill. I can speak after 2 o'clock just as well. I think it is important that the militia bill should be considered, and I am very anxious to have it disposed of if we can agree upon a time for voting. The morning hour will possibly be occupied otherwise anyway. I gave the notice that at the close of the morning business I would desire to address the Senate, if it is agreeable.

Mr. QUAY. The difficulty is that the regular order is to proceed at 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. FORAKER. What is the regular order?

Mr. QUAY. The Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. FORAKER. I have negotiated with the Senator from Minnesota, and he has agreed that it would be no discourtesy to him, if he has not concluded by that time, if I should take the floor at that hour.

Mr. QUAY. Then I withdraw my objection, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, as is well known to Senators, by reason of the debate that has been had upon this bill, there is no objection to the bill on this side of the Chamber so far as it relates to the organization of the militia. On the contrary, we are all of us in favor of it and would be glad to have the bill passed to-day.

The bill contains a provision for the creation of that which the Senator from Wisconsin himself aptly and properly terms as an adjunct to the Regular Army. To that there is very serious objection, and there are a number of Senators on this side who desire to be heard. It is impossible, in view of the condition of the business and of the number of measures which are pressing for consideration, to be able to say what time can be given between now and the 20th to enable them to be thus heard; and if it is the purpose of the majority to insist that the militia bill shall carry with it this provision, which relates exclusively to the Regular Army, I must object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. BACON. I do not object to so much of the request as relates to the consideration of the bill, but I do object to that part of it which proposes to fix a time for the vote so long as the twenty-fourth section is in the bill.

Mr. QUARLES. Then I ask unanimous consent that the bill known as the militia bill may be taken up to-morrow morning immediately after the routine business of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that immediately on the conclusion of the routine morning business to-morrow morning the militia bill may be taken up for consideration.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to know whether that is to the exclusion of the regular order when 2 o'clock arrives?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. QUARLES. Oh, no; not at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business holds its place.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to make another reservation, which I am sure the Senator from Wisconsin will not object to, that it shall not interfere with the consideration of a revenue bill. I have reason to believe that the House may pass a bill to-day which will be here some time in the course of the day; and if so, it probably will be reported back to-morrow morning by the Committee on Finance, and if we can secure the attention of the Senate it will be passed possibly in the morning hour.

Mr. COCKRELL. What bill is that?

Mr. ALDRICH. A revenue bill from the House.

Mr. QUARLES. If that emergency should arise, I will say to the Senator that there will be no objection to its consideration.

Mr. ALDRICH. I take it for granted.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. What is the effect, so far as it relates to other business, of this unanimous-consent agreement? The point I desire to ask the Chair for information upon is this: If unanimous consent shall be given that the bill shall be taken up at the time mentioned by the Senator from Wisconsin, does that confine the Senate necessarily to the consideration of the bill during that morning hour and succeeding morning hours, to the exclusion of the consideration of other questions?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Only during that morning hour.

Mr. BACON. But during that morning hour it does?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. BACON. In other words, if consent is given and the order is made, during the morning hour immediately after the conclusion of the routine business this bill will be in order, and no other business will be in order until 2 o'clock?

Mr. HOAR. Unless this bill is sooner disposed of in the meantime.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, of course; if it is disposed of.

Mr. BACON. Then I shall object. I wish the Senator from Wisconsin to understand that I do not object to his calling the bill up at any time when other business of the Senate can properly be displaced by it, but I do object to an order which will give it the exclusive right of way during the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. QUARLES. Then, Mr. President, I desire to move that the bill known as the militia bill shall be taken up for consideration to-morrow immediately after the routine business, to occupy the morning hour to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator allow the Chair to suggest that the motion be made to-morrow morning. Otherwise it would make it a special order.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator to give notice.

Mr. QUARLES. Then I give notice that to-morrow morning I shall move to take up the bill known as the militia bill immediately after the routine business.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will supplement that notice by the further notice that he will make a similar motion on every morning, subject, of course, to the right of appropriation and revenue bills, until the measure is disposed of.

Mr. QUARLES. That is my purpose, Mr. President.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Vest resolution, which is the pending business, should go over to-day because of the lack of completion of discussion on it, would it be handed to the Senate to-morrow as the regular order, which could not be displaced except by a vote of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If it goes over to-day without a unanimous-consent agreement that it shall retain its place on the table, it goes to the Calendar.

Mr. TILLMAN. Without unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without unanimous consent.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understood that; but what I was trying to reach was the President's ruling as to whether a Senator who was speaking, for instance, at 2 o'clock, could resume the floor to-morrow when the resolution came up. Of course I understand that under our liberal rules here you can not keep a man from talking, and if I happen to be speaking on the resolution when the morning hour expires to-day, I could just as easily talk on whatever might be brought up; I could unbosom myself on the military bill or any other bill. Therefore I am not so anxious about getting an opportunity to be heard. I simply wanted to know whether I could talk on some subject that was relevant or whether I should be compelled to address the Senate when some subject which was irrelevant was under consideration.

ANTHRACITE COAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over by unanimous consent from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. VEST on the 5th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to prepare and report a bill amending "An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States," approved July 24, 1897, so that the tariff duty shall be removed from anthracite coal and the same be placed on the free list.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], who desires to make some remarks on the resolution.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I have not desired to get entangled in this controversy, and would have avoided it had it not been for some observations made on yesterday by the honorable Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], which, it seems to me, require a little attention and an appropriate reply.

The Senator from Tennessee—whom I do not now see in the Chamber, although he was here a moment since——

Mr. BATE. I do not think my colleague has been here this morning.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, he was here; and he will be in the Chamber again in a few minutes.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have asked that he be sent for.

The Senator from Tennessee, quoting, I think, from a speech of the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], has made a very interesting and curious attack upon the Secretary of the Treasury.

I am not one of those who look for very much relief from the coal famine through any action which Congress may take in respect of the alleged duty on anthracite coal. A person in this city who has seen his coal bill rise to $12 a ton has difficulty in getting up either zeal or enthusiasm for a scheme of relief that proposes a remission of a duty of 67 cents. However, under all the circumstances of the case, I do not doubt the propriety of restoring, at least for the time being, the law as to coal as it stood up to 1897, though I am very far from agreeing with those who think or with those who have said that the provisions of the present law were sneaked into the bill of 1897 in any underhand or covert way whatever.

The thing about the coal traffic that has impressed me more than anything else is the fact that when others were indifferent and careless and without foresight the head of the executive department of the Government, long before the shortage arose, with extraordinary practical wisdom and good sense, forecast the intolerable conditions that were about to be visited upon our people; and we owe to him more than to anybody else that the coal famine, so called, has borne as lightly as it has upon the people of the United States.

It is to the credit, it appears to me, of the Secretary of the Treasury that he entered into the spirit and purpose of the President for preventing, as far as the executive department might be able to avert it, such a visitation as has been threatened against the community; and it seems at least unfortunate that the Senator from Tennessee should have made the effort of the Secretary of the Treasury to forward the purpose which has animated the executive department the occasion for an attack which can hardly be described as less than absurd in the light of all the facts.

I find that the Senator from Tennessee has referred to the Secretary of the Treasury in terms which he thinks applicable to the despots of English and other history, and has alluded to him as a nullifier of the statutes of the United States in exercising arbitrary authority in his great office.

Now, the facts are that the Secretary of the Treasury has done nothing that any man of ordinary business prudence under the same circumstances would not have done.

The act of 1897 made an effort to define anthracite coal, and I think an intelligent and proper effort in that direction. The line of distinction was the amount of fixed carbon contained in the article called anthracite; and the limit under which the duty should be collected, and above which it should not be collected, was drawn at 92 per cent of fixed carbon.

At the time the Secretary of the Treasury took the action which is complained of, cargoes of coal were being presented at New York and elsewhere, and the cargo which drew out the order upon which the Senator from Tennessee has commented had a very singular history. It had been chemically tested twice by reputable chemists acting for the importing house and found to contain 94 per cent of fixed carbon. It had once been tested by the officers of the Department and found to contain more than 92 per cent. Another test indicated a slight shade under 92. Under the circumstances the Secretary of the Treasury gave an order, directed to the collectors of customs at New York, at Boston, and at all the coal ports, which, it seems to me, is not only good common sense, but is so framed as to particularly free him from the odium of such charges of despotism and usurpation as are made against him by the honorable Senator from Tennessee.

I have here the order of the Secretary of the Treasury, made under the circumstances which I have described, and I will ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
DIVISION OF CUSTOMS,
Washington, October 6, 1902.

MY DEAR SIR: Reports indicate that quite a large quantity of coal is being imported. If any portion of this should arrive at the port of New York, the Department desires every facility afforded for its prompt delivery. So far as may be, give consignments of coal the preference over everything else, and solve all reasonable doubts for the present in favor of the coal importer.

Very truly, yours,

L. M. SHAW.

Hon. N. N. STRANAHAN,
Collector of Customs, New York City.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will say, Mr. President, that the same order was delivered to the collectors of customs at all the coal ports of the United States. I believe the honorable Senator from Tennessee will agree with me that it contains nothing that ought to hold the Secretary of the Treasury up to odious comparisons with the tyrants of English or Roman history, or other desperately wicked persons.

Now, while I am upon my feet, Mr. President, I am constrained to say a few things in reference to matters which have become subjects of debate here, although they are not strictly pertinent to a discussion such as is involved in the resolution under consideration.

A very entertaining controversy has grown up about the designs and purposes of Congress, and especially of the late honored chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, in respect to the reciprocity treaties based upon the tariff law of 1897; and I desire to say candidly, because there are reasons which ought to move everybody to speak with candor, that I have been disappointed in the total failure of Congress to take up, consider, and favorably dispose of the pending reciprocity treaties.

I presume that something of my interest in these treaties arises from the fact that they were negotiated by one of the most famous men in the public life of the State which I have the honor in part to represent here, and I have felt that the attitude of Congress toward these treaties is far from creditable to the Government of the United States. We saw the reciprocity treaties of 1890 cast into the sea without a moment's notice to the ten or fifteen foreign countries with whom we had solemnly negotiated them. We have since, by law, authorized the negotiation of other treaties, some of which are pending before the Senate and the House in the present Congress, and we have been so far forgetful of the high obligation which rests upon the Congress of the United States under the tariff law of 1897, that we have not given to those solemn public negotiations the poor courtesy of a casual consideration. I feel sure that everybody who is familiar with the diplomatic history of the United States will agree with me that, following the rude cancellation without notice of the reciprocity treaties of 1890, this negligence and indifference of Congress has cast still further odium upon the treaty-making power of the United States.

I will not seek the attention of the Senate as a witness to conversations with the dead or with the living, but I may, I think, be permitted to say that I share with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] his kindly and generous feeling toward the memory of Governor Dingley. The only thing that has depressed me about it is that, in defending Governor Dingley against the charge that was made against him, the Senator from Maine has left the impression upon the country that some infamous accusation had been made against his fair fame. He was charged here with the hideous crime of having so arranged the tariff schedules in the law of 1897 as to warrant and permit the negotiation of reciprocal trade treaties with foreign countries, and he has been accused, almost in terms of reproach, of having been guilty of the complex offense of deliberately putting duties up in order that they might be negotiated down.

I do not intend to indulge in any bearing of testimony as to Governor Dingley's views. He left his opinions upon record, and no man in the history of the United States has left a cleaner or more honorable record. But it is true that in the bill which he reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, of which at the time I had the honor to be a very humble member, duties were put up for the express purpose of having them traded down. I refer expressly to the provision in the House bill reported April 1, 1897, in relation to the sugar duties.

It is proper for me to say that Governor Dingley took less interest in the reciprocity aspects of the tariff agitation of that period than probably anybody else upon the committee.

I had the honor to serve as a member of the subcommittee, of which Representative HOPKINS, of Illinois, was chairman, which dealt with the reciprocity problems of that period, and in the discussion of the tariff law of 1897 Governor Dingley very courteously turned over to Mr. HOPKINS the discussion of the reciprocity provisions of the proposed measure. I propose to read from a speech of the 22d of March, 1897, by Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. He said:

We seek in authorizing the President to suspend the rates of duty, and that thereupon and thereafter there shall be collected a lower duty than the one specified in the bill, to make it an object for countries producing the articles named in the first part of this reciprocity bill to enter into these reciprocal agreements or make equivalent concessions in favor of the products of our farms and factories which enter their markets. Let me illustrate. We furnish for Germany to-day her largest market for beet sugar. Millions of dollars worth of this product, manufactured in Germany, is yearly consumed by American citizens. In framing this bill, in order to raise sufficient revenue to run the Government and meet all the expenditures that the Administration may be called upon to pay, we have imposed a certain rate of duty on sugar, commencing with 1 cent per pound on all sugars that will test 75 degrees by the polariscopic test and increasing three one-hundredths of 1 cent on every additional degree until we reach 100 degrees, and then adding one-eighth of 1 cent per pound for refined sugar. Now, we have provided in this reciprocity branch of the bill that only 92 per cent of this duty shall be collected from countries importing sugar here that enter into reciprocal agreements with the United States, and we believe that will be a sufficient inducement to the German Government to reopen her markets for all of the products of our farms and factories.

I will read further from Mr. HOPKINS, to show that, so far at least as some members of the committee of which Governor Dingley was the chairman were concerned, it was the hope—a hope in which I myself shared—that these reciprocity provisions which we inserted in the bill should be enlarged very much beyond the scope outlined by the report of the committee; for we were crowded for time. The extra session of Congress was coming on apace; we were busy with the details of the various schedules of the bill, and the great scheme of providing a working reciprocity system was not as fully considered in the committee as we hoped it would be considered before the adjournment of that Congress which had to deal with the bill. So Mr. HOPKINS said:

We stand for protection first and foremost, and we desire to couple with that the principle of opening foreign markets for our goods; but the gentleman can see that it would not do at all to take all the duty from sugar, because if we did Germany would furnish us all the sugar that would be consumed here, and would destroy the industry in this country. We must have a maximum and a minimum rate on all articles manufactured and produced in this country.

Mr. President, it seems to me to require somebody's attention when that homely, sensible, time-tested plan now in practice in nearly every country in the world, of fixing the rate of duty high enough to be made the basis of subsequent reciprocal agreements, is denounced here in the Senate of the United States as an infamy, against which the memory of Governor Dingley is to be defended. I for one at least feel a constraint of conscience to stand here and say that, in my humble opinion, there is nothing infamous about it. It is a scheme that is in practice in every government of Europe that has a tariff system at all similar to our own. It is a system that ought not to be spoken of here as infamous, because it is at least as important a part of the tariff law of 1897 as is the duty on coal, for instance. Fortunately we do not have to pry into the secrets of Governor Dingley's grave to find out exactly what was in the mind of Congress when the law which bears his great name was passed.

I have here the tariff act of 1897, and I intend to read a section that Governor Dingley did not put into the bill—a section that found its way into the bill, I think, in conference after it had passed both Houses, although I may be mistaken about that. But I want to call attention to section 4 of the tariff act of 1897, which reads:

SEC. 4. That whenever the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with a view to secure reciprocal trade with foreign countries, shall, within the period of two years from and after the passage of this act, enter into commercial treaty or treaties with any other country or countries concerning the admission into any such country or countries of the goods, wares, and merchandise of the United States and their use and disposition therein, deemed to be for the interests of the United States, and in such treaty or treaties, in consideration of the advantages accruing to the United States therefrom, shall provide for the reduction during a specified period, not exceeding five years, of the duties imposed by this act, to the extent of not more than 20 per cent thereof, upon such goods, wares, or merchandise as may be designated therein of the country or countries with which such treaty or treaties shall be made as in this section provided for; or shall provide for the transfer during such period from the dutiable list of this act to the free list thereof of such goods, wares, and merchandise, being the natural products of such foreign country or countries and not of the United States; or shall provide for the retention upon the free list of this act during a specified period, not exceeding five years, of such goods, wares, and merchandise now included in said free list as may be designated therein; and when any such treaty shall have been duly ratified by the Senate and approved by Congress, and public proclamation made accordingly, then and thereafter the duties which shall be collected by the United States upon any of the designated goods, wares, and merchandise from the foreign country with which such treaty has been made shall, during the period provided for, be the duties specified and provided for in such treaty, and none other.

Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that whatever Governor Dingley may have said or done the Congress of the United States did solemnly authorize the President to enter into reciprocal negotiations with foreign countries for the purpose of extending American commerce by the simple expedient of reducing, not to exceed 20 per cent, the duties assessed by the tariff law, and if it was infamous for Governor Dingley and if it is a reproach to his memory to have suggested that such a thing was in his mind or in the mind of anybody else, what shall be said of the great body of both Houses of the Congress of the United States? If it is necessary for learned and able men, honored in the public service, to rise in this Chamber to defend the memory of Governor Dingley against an infamous charge like that, where is the advocate who shall defend the memory of the Congress of 1897?

I say to you, Mr. President, that that portion of the tariff law of 1897 is as distinctly a part of the tariff policy of the United States as the coal schedule or any other schedule, and I undertake to say here that more violence has been done to the protective system of the United States by the quiet and uncommunicative failure of the Senate of the United States to take action upon the treaties which were negotiated under the authority of the act of 1897 than by all the noise that has been made on the other side of this Chamber about coal or the other so-called extortions of the law.

There is a popular interest in this controversy that is not altogether represented by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] or the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK]. For one I stand for the whole protective policy of the United States; the law of 1897, modified as it may be in the wisdom of Congress from time to time to meet the changing conditions of American business. It would be a reproach to the statesmanship of the United States to say that there is no way of changing the tariff schedules of 1897 without a general tariff agitation and hostile explosions on the subject in the arena of partisan politics. For forty years we have had no mechanism for changing the tariff in detail except by a swing of the pendulum toward the material ruin involved in the threat of Democratic free trade. Our whole tariff system has already, at least once, been worn out for the want of repairs, until at last its enemies captured the citadel of authority and overthrew it in the midst of panic and disturbance from which no branch of American business was able to escape.

It was in the mind of the late President of the United States—and I speak not without personal knowledge of his purpose and of his convictions—that we had at last reached a period when the protective system, as a system, was without organized opposition anywhere in the United States, and I feel sure that I do not misrepresent his purposes and his convictions when I say that he looked forward to the gradual extension of American commerce, not by hostile agitation of the tariff question, but by a quiet and orderly extension of the principle of reciprocity, remitting duties, from time to time, that could be spared, and gathering in the commercial good will of all of the great countries of the world; and if his last public appearance before the American people and before mankind had any significance at all it meant that the future of American commerce depends in a large measure upon the gradual readjustment of those tariff schedules of 1897 which are no longer needed to give our own industries a fair and profitable footing in our own market place.

I do not intend, having been all my lifetime a disciple of Mr. Blaine and nearly all my lifetime a follower of William McKinley—I do not intend to sit quiet in this Chamber while it is said to be infamous that anybody should have the notion that a tariff schedule once framed could not be honorably modified by sensible trade negotiations with the world. It is a reproach to the Government of the United States to-day that there is hardly a line of the wisdom of James G. Blaine remaining upon the statute books of our country, and that not one step has been taken to give reality to the magnificent vision which illuminated the last days of poor McKinley's earthly career.

I for one have made up my mind that the time has come when somebody whose convictions do not lie along the path of silence and quietude and ease in our political Zion should declare here that the whole future of the protective system in the United States depends upon the wisdom with which the Congress of the United States fulfills the aspirations which found an expression so lofty in the last public utterance of William McKinley.

Mr. TILLMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. CARMACK. Will the Senator from South Carolina allow me to say a few words?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, I have only a few words to say in regard to the matter to which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] referred in the early part of his speech. The Senator from Iowa accuses me of having made reckless charges against the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Shaw. I want to say that that question comes properly between the junior Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Iowa. I am not the author of the charge to which the Senator refers. I simply quoted the accusation as made by the Senator from Massachusetts. I referred to a speech made by the Senator from Massachusetts during the late campaign at New Haven, Conn., in which that Senator asked the question:

> Who let coal come in without a rigid inspection of the amount of required carbon? The Republican Secretary of the Treasury, Shaw.

If that means anything in the world, it means that the Secretary of the Treasury omitted to make the necessary inspection to determine whether or not the coal contained the amount of carbon required by law. That is a charge in effect that he suspended the law. The only purpose of making a rigid inspection was to determine whether or not the coal did contain the amount of required carbon. The only purpose of letting the coal come in without inspection was to let it come in regardless of whether or not it contained the required carbon.

So I say that if the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts is correct, it amounts to an accusation that the Secretary of the Treasury practically suspended the law, and in the statement made the other day by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] he quoted a letter from L. G. Martin, special deputy collector, at Philadelphia, in which he says that no analysis of coal was made; that "the coal was passed free of duty upon the oath of the importer."

Mr. President, everybody knows that if that was adopted as a rule, it would be utterly insufficient as a matter of protection. You could not rely upon the oaths of importers as to whether or not the goods imported were dutiable, and the only object of omitting the rigid inspection which had theretofore been required was to let the coal come in regardless of the requirements of the law.

I repeat, it is not an accusation which I have made. It was a matter for boasting on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts during the late campaign. He boasted to the people of New England that while the Republican party had enacted a law to keep out anthracite coal, the Republican Secretary of the Treasurer, Shaw, had suspended the law to let the coal come in. That is the substance of his statement. It is a matter of which he boasted before his constituents, and he carried the State of Connecticut upon that boast. If he had told the people that the Secretary of the Treasury had enforced the law, the State of Connecticut, I have no doubt, would have gone Democratic. The law was so unpopular that it was actually popular for the Secretary of the Treasury to assume the authority of suppressing, abrogating, abolishing this Republican law.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do I understand the Senator from Tennessee to say that Connecticut and Iowa have nullified?

Mr. CARMACK. You understand the Senator from Massachusetts to say that they have done so.

Mr. TILLMAN. And that the Senator from Massachusetts indorses nullification?

Mr. CARMACK. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thought that was a South Carolina monopoly.

Mr. CARMACK. It used to be, but times change and sections of this country change with them. Massachusetts has now become the great nullifying State, and it is not John C. Calhoun, but the junior Senator from Massachusetts, who is now the great nullifier in this Chamber.

Mr. President, I was glad to hear the bold and brave and outspoken speech of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER]. Charges have been made that Senators upon this side of the Chamber have made partisan speeches. It is not necessary that we should make any more. I am willing from this time on that the debate shall be conducted between Senators upon the other side of the Chamber. I am glad to hear the admission made by the Senator from Iowa that the rates of duty in the Dingley Act were purposely made too high, even from the standpoint of a Republican, even from the standpoint of a most extreme protectionist, with a view to their subsequent reduction by reciprocity treaties.

The Senator from Iowa says he is very much disappointed that no action has been taken by this Congress on those treaties. The Senator's disappointment is liable to grow deeper as the days go by. No action ever will be taken by the Senate or by this Congress on those reciprocity treaties, because the Dingley bill having been enacted, in the minds of protectionists it has become a sacred thing. Nobody would defend the anthracite coal duty as a separate and distinct measure, but having been merged, incorporated, and become a part of the sanctified Dingley Act, the laying of a hand upon that sacred measure now would be an act of sacrilege like unto that of the overzealous Jew who laid his hand on the Ark of the Covenant. You must not touch the Dingley Act, although the duties were made too high, even from the standpoint of Republicans and of protectionists themselves. It has become a law, and you must not change it for reciprocity or to relieve the suffering people of the country now in the midst of winter, or for any other purpose.

As I have said, I do not care to go into this debate any further. I think it is unnecessary. When the Senator from Rhode Island and other Senators upon the other side of the Chamber have answered the powerful argument and the powerful appeal made by the Senator from Iowa, it will be time enough for some other Democrat to say something on this question.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAIRBANKS in the chair). The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. Of course.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts can not yield the floor to me, when I just yielded it to the Senator from Tennessee and hold it in my own right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair when the Senator from South Carolina obtained the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Presiding Officer recognizes my right to the floor I will yield to the Senator from Massachusetts; otherwise I shall claim it.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; if the Senator from South Carolina is——

Mr. TILLMAN. Does not the Senator from Massachusetts recognize that the floor is mine?

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely; it is yours.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I yield to Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I am very much indebted to the Senator from South Carolina. I shall take but a moment.

Mr. President, I had the misfortune—for it is always a misfortune to miss the Senator from Tennessee when he addresses the Senate—to be absent from the Chamber yesterday when he quoted from a speech of mine at New Haven. I am not sure—I think it is a long-hand report—whether or not those were my exact words.

But I have no disposition to dispute the intention of what I said. The purport is certainly correct. I was referring to the letter read here by the Senator from Iowa this morning as to the action of the Secretary of the Treasury. It was a time of great public exigency. In his directions to his collectors of customs, he proposed to construe very liberally the law in regard to the test of coal, relaxing it, if you prefer that word. I thought it was an exigency in which he was justified entirely in doing it, and I think so still. I did not, however, and I do not want to have anything attributed to me that is not mine, compare him to the Stuart Kings of England or any other despots, for I think I may say that I had too strong a sense of humor to do that.

I think he was right. I think it was an exigency requiring such action, and I added what does not appear in the quotation here, that if he needed an act of indemnity for anything he had done, the Congress of the United States I had no doubt would give it to him, with the full approbation of the people of the United States.

I do not conceive that he nullified the law. I am perfectly certain that neither Massachusetts nor Connecticut nullified the law because the collectors of ports are not State officers. But I do think that the Secretary, in giving the order at that time to his collectors to construe the law liberally in regard to the test on coal, did a courageous and a right thing. I applauded him then. I applaud him now. I think he was fully justified, and I think it was courageous, because he took the risk of misunderstanding and of attack, and was ready to do it and to trust to the good sense of the Congress of the United States and the people of the United States if he did relax a law which at the moment, owing to peculiar conditions, pressed very hardly upon the people of the United States. I have nothing to withdraw in regard to my praise of the Secretary.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. If I understand the Senator, his position is that the Secretary of the Treasury did not suspend the law; he just relaxed it.

Mr. LODGE. I think he construed it liberally. I think he relaxed it probably in those instructions which have been read here. I should say it was——

Mr. CARMACK. Why was any suggestion of an indemnity on the part of Congress necessary?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think any was necessary.

Mr. CARMACK. Why did the Senator suggest it?

Mr. LODGE. I said if one were necessary, which is a different thing. I put in the hypothesis purposely, because I did not mean to advocate any officer violating the laws of the United States.

Mr. CARMACK. What does the Senator mean by relaxing a law?

Mr. LODGE. I mean exactly what I have said, that he construed the matter of the test of coal liberally and that he told his collectors to construe it liberally——

Mr. CARMACK. For what purpose?

Mr. LODGE. As it was read here this morning. That is what it amounted to—to construe it liberally.

Mr. DOLLIVER. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, these tests of a cargo of coal are necessarily very difficult and uncertain. You have to take a certain small portion of the coal and test it. It very often happens that one test indicates that the coal is a little above the minimum grade, while another shows it is under, and there would be a contradiction of tests, as there was in the case upon which the Secretary's order was issued; and in such cases the direction of the Secretary to the collector was to solve doubts and uncertainties about it in favor of the free importation of coal. There was something wrong about it.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I understood at the time, and to that I referred. And if my praise of the Secretary in that connection had the great effect which the Senator from Tennessee is kind enough to attribute to it, of carrying the State of Connecticut for the Republican party, I am glad my remarks were so effective.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from South Carolina allow me?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have yielded so much that if I yield further there will be nothing left of the morning hour.

Mr. ALDRICH. We will have another morning hour.

Mr. TILLMAN. We have notice that to-morrow we will take up something else.

Mr. ALDRICH. This question is certain to be back here in some form or other.

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly; the discussion of this question will be back here in some form or other, but I have a peculiar desire to discuss it on the Vest resolution. Will the Senator from Rhode Island protect me in my right after the expiration of this morning hour?

Mr. ALDRICH. I certainly will, if the Senator needs protection?

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Vest resolution may retain its place and come up for discussion to-morrow morning.

Mr. ALLISON. On Thursday, if to-morrow has been assigned.

Mr. TILLMAN. The morning hour to-morrow has not been assigned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the request of the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. I make the request that the pending resolution at the expiration of the morning hour to-day shall not lose its place, but shall go over and be taken up for discussion to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the resolution before the Senate be considered to-morrow morning——

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that it shall retain its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That the resolution shall retain its present place before the Senate. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. TILLMAN. I now yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. BAILEY. Before the Senator from Rhode Island proceeds——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do, for a suggestion.

Mr. BAILEY. In order that there may be no misunderstanding about it, I do not see in the Chamber the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES], who gave notice of his intention to move to take up the militia bill to-morrow. I believe that even under this arrangement that Senator could come into the Chamber and make the motion.

Mr. BERRY. He is bound by the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. ALDRICH. The unanimous-consent agreement supersedes that.

Mr. LODGE. This is morning business, too.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. There is the Senator from Wisconsin, and he has not objected.

Mr. BAILEY. I simply desired to have it understood, because those mistakes arise sometimes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I am not surprised that the lines of discussion upon the pending resolution should have broadened and broadened from time to time as it has proceeded. I expected this when the Senator from Missouri first offered it. I do not intend at this time to attempt to reply or to allude at any length to the eloquent exemplification of the Iowa idea to which the Senate has just listened. I have been trying to discuss a much narrower question. The allegation was made here that Mr. Dingley, as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, made the statement in March, 1897, the tariff act of 1897 being then before the Ways and Means Committee for consideration, that he had deliberately placed the protective duties of that measure too high, for the purpose of having them reduced afterwards by reciprocity treaties.

Now, if any friend or associate of the late Governor Dingley can remain silent to that charge, and does not repel it, if he believes it to be untrue, as it certainly is, then I do not understand that person's idea of honor. I have already stated, and shown by the RECORD, that at the time when this conversation is alleged to have taken place the House reciprocity provisions of the act of 1897 had already been agreed upon. They were agreed upon at least three weeks before any such conversation could have taken place. They were in print; I have a copy of the printed bill before me, and they had the approval of the majority members of the committee. The terms were known to the Senator from Iowa and every Republican member of the committee. They contain provisions for certain specified reductions in duty under certain conditions. They did not touch a single protective duty in the act of 1897, unless sugar duties are considered protective; and every member of the committee knew it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Will the Senator from Rhode Island permit me?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Does he regard the duties on sugar as nonprotective?

Mr. ALDRICH. I said in my remarks made yesterday that there was a difference of opinion upon this floor as to whether the duties upon sugar were protective or nonprotective—whether they were protective or revenue duties. The Senators upon the other side of the Chamber from Louisiana and other States producing sugar have always defended them upon the ground that they were revenue duties. Certainly up to a very recent period, when the production of sugar in the United States reached a point where they might be protective, the sugar duties were revenue duties. The Senator from Iowa knows as well as I do that with that single exception every duty proposed to be changed was a revenue duty, pure and simple.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Now, will the Senator, having alluded to me, explain the schedule in section 4 as finally passed?

Mr. ALDRICH. We are now discussing, and I hope the Senator from Iowa can understand that, what Mr. Dingley said in reference to this bill or what he is purported to have said in March, 1897, before the fourth section was in existence even in the mind or imagination of any man anywhere. The House of Representatives, the Committee of Ways and Means, of which the Senator was on honored member, had, I repeat, their scheme of reciprocity which they had put into the bill in terms. It referred, as I have said, only to certain articles. It did not touch any one of the protective duties of that act—not one. It is morally and physically impossible that Mr. Dingley could have then said, with that bill before him, that he had deliberately put the protective duties of that measure too high for the purpose of reducing them thereafter by reciprocity treaties.

It is impossible, I say. It is not true, I say to the Senator from Iowa, that either the Committee on Ways and Means, or the House of Representatives, or the Committee on Finance, or the Senate adopted protective duties that were too high for the purpose of having them reduced by reciprocity provisions or otherwise. I deny for myself and for my associates, as well as for Mr. Dingley and his associates, that any such thing was——

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do.

Mr. DOLLIVER. That would make it very interesting to me to know what was in the mind of the honorable Senator from Rhode Island and of Congress in inserting the provision known as section 4 of the act as finally passed.

Mr. ALDRICH. When I get to it I will be very glad to explain it and to give the historical facts in relation to its insertion in the bill. I am now discussing whether Governor Dingley, in March, 1897, stated that he had in that bill at that time put the protective duties too high for the purpose of having them reduced by reciprocity treaties. That is the only controversy here in which Governor Dingley's name is involved. I have alluded to this allegation because I know that the high commissioner who negotiated the reciprocity treaties to which the Senator from Iowa has alluded did make a similar statement to that made upon this floor by the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Tennessee, and my remarks are not therefore solely directed to those Senators.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Will the Senator permit me to say that when that was done before the Committee on Foreign Affairs it was not disputed at all by anybody?

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose there was nobody there who knew the facts.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The honored President of the Senate asked the question.

Mr. ALDRICH. I presume that the honorable President of the Senate did not know the facts. I assume that he did not. If he had known them he certainly would have denied the statement.

I say the whole question before the Senate is whether Governor Dingley made any such statement in the first instance, and in the next instance whether it is true; and I enter my denial here as well for myself as for Governor Dingley that it is true.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do.

Mr. CARMACK. It is for a suggestion. The question whether Governor Dingley said so and so is not the whole question.

Mr. ALDRICH. The question whether it is true is the whole question.

Mr. CARMACK. No, sir; it is not the whole question, with all due respect to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. What is it, then?

Mr. CARMACK. The question is whether or not it is a fact that the duties in the Dingley Act were made higher than was necessary for just purposes of protection; whether when the law was enacted it was considered by the men who voted for that bill and passed it that the duties were high enough to stand subsequent reduction by reciprocal trade relations with other countries.

Mr. ALDRICH. I imagine that the Senator from Tennessee and myself would never agree as to whether the protective duties in any bill were placed too high. I assume that the Senator from Tennessee would believe that any protective tariff fixed duties too high. If the Senator means whether, in the view of the men who prepared the measure and reported it, they were placed too high, I say to him directly and emphatically, no.

Mr. CARMACK. Whether they were put high enough to stand subsequent reduction by reciprocity arrangements?

Mr. ALDRICH. They were not; and I hope the Senator is satisfied with the directness and positiveness of the reply.

Mr. CARMACK. I understand the Senator from Rhode Island, but I do not understand section 4 of the bill, in view of his remarks.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will take that up later on, if the Senator will allow me.

I repeat, that the sole question here, which I am discussing at this moment, is whether Governor Dingley made any such statement, and I say that the aspersions upon his character (because I do consider it an aspersion upon his character to say that he was deliberately deceiving Congress and the American people by making the duties too high in order to be prepared for their subsequent reduction or removal) are without one scintilla of evidence to support them. The Senator from Iowa does not presume here, as an associate of his, to repeat the charge. I know and that Senator knows, from his frequent conferences with him, that Governor Dingley did not assent with zeal to the reciprocity provisions. I know what the Senator perhaps does not know, that he consented very reluctantly to enlarge the reciprocity provisions of the House bill, and not until after a long discussion in the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The House passed the bill containing the provisions I have described on the 31st of March, if I am not mistaken. The bill came here, and was referred to the Committee on Finance, who considered it for several weeks.

It was reported back to the Senate by me May 4, and in making the report I made the statement that the committee recommended striking out the reciprocity provisions of the House of Representatives, and that they would at some subsequent period prepare and present to the Senate an amendment which more nearly represented their views as to the proper provisions to be entered upon with reference to reciprocity.

On the 30th day of June, more than three months after the time of the alleged confidential conversation, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], I then being absent on account of illness, reported the reciprocity provisions, which became a part of the law as the fourth section. What does this section mean? Does it mean that we are to deliberately destroy, under its provisions, American industries? Did it mean that, as interpreted by the late President of the United States? No; it did not. It meant, in the minds of those who had it in charge and who had originated it, that we might perhaps make reciprocity treaties with other countries with respect to noncompetitive products, as we had done under the act of 1890. Did it mean that we were going to surrender all the industries of the United States to the selfish interests, if you please, of the agricultural-implement manufacturers? I think not. Certainly the gentlemen who had the most to do with the framing of that section as it was adopted by the Senate did not so think.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island while this is something of a family quarrel the rest of us are interested, and when he turns around and speaks sotto voce to the Senator from Iowa, the rest of us are not affected by the eloquence and cogency of his argument. I ask the Senator to address the Chair or to speak a little louder.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was not aware that I was speaking too low to be heard.

Mr. TILLMAN. I could not hear a word, but I could see the Senator gesticulating.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should be sorry, I am sure, if anything I say should miss the attention of the Senator from South Carolina.

The fourth section of the act of 1897 provided that the President might for a period of two years enter into negotiations for reciprocity treaties with foreign nations, and that in and through those treaties he might provide for certain reductions upon the duties upon agricultural and other products of such countries when imported into the United States, not to exceed 20 per cent.

It was never for one moment supposed by any Republican upon the Committee on Finance, and I can make the assertion without fear of contradiction that it was never for one moment supposed by Mr. Dingley or his Republican associates upon the conference committee representing the House of Representatives, that there was to be any surrender through this method of the principle of protection. It was never believed for one moment that a Republican administration through any agency would give up the vital principle which ever lies at the foundation of Republican policy. There was no such purpose and no such idea.

I did believe it was possible, and I now believe it is possible to make reciprocity treaties, going back to Mr. Blaine's idea, with our neighbors in the seas, upon the islands, in Central America, in Mexico, and South America, and in the countries of the Orient, by which, through the exchange of noncompetitive or other products, we shall secure mutual advantages.

Does the Senator from Iowa suppose for an instant that any man on that committee contemplated the negotiation of a treaty with the Argentine Republic that should reduce the duty upon wool 20 per cent? And yet his language would imply exactly that. Do you suppose that we thought for one instant that the interests of the United States were to be sacrificed through reciprocity treaties?

I am earnestly for reciprocity, real, genuine reciprocity, by which the United States shall secure reciprocal advantages in the trade of the world, and not a reciprocity dictated by the selfish motives of a few interests in this country as against all the others.

I resent the imputation that because I oppose certain treaties that I am opposed to the reciprocity theory. The Senator from Iowa has alluded in glowing terms to the reciprocity provisions in the act of 1890. I wrote every word of those provisions. They were inserted in the Senate at my suggestion. They were adopted very reluctantly by the House of Representatives. Does the Senator think that I am any the less in favor of real reciprocity than he is because a citizen of his State has negotiated reciprocity treaties which have not been acted upon by the Senate? It will redound to the credit of the gentleman who negotiated those treaties if they are passed over in silence and if the Senate should never act upon them.

The Senator from Iowa is very much mistaken if he supposes for one instant that we are not ready to discuss those treaties or the questions they involve with him here or anywhere, or that he can make it appear that on account of our opposition we are not as good friends of reciprocity as he is. Whether a reciprocity treaty is wise or unwise is a practical question. In regard to the treaties which are now here, and as to which, perhaps, I transgress the rules if I allude to them, if he can show that any of them are proper and will result in furthering the interests of the people of the United States he can be sure of their ratification. I have been led to discuss the treaties somewhat from the remarks of the Senator from Iowa, and partly because some of the friends of the treaties have openly discussed them through the press.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The injunction of secrecy has been removed.

Mr. ALDRICH. It has been removed from some of the treaties, I agree. Such secrecy as has been secured has been entirely one-sided. There have been widely distributed through official channels specious arguments and misstatements in regard to the nature and effect of these treaties, and perhaps I shall be forgiven for making this protest in a public manner.

I did not intend, Mr. President, to be led into this diversion, but I could not allow the statements of the Senator from Iowa to go unchallenged. I knew the men who would line up behind the statement of the Senator from Missouri in regard to Governor Dingley and in regard to the character of the legislation of 1897. I am quite willing to meet any arguments or statements these gentlemen may see fit to make in criticism of the measure or the motives of those who supported it.

Mr. TILLMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have only seven minutes before the expiration of the morning hour, but I yield gladly to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. I simply rose for the purpose of suggesting that if the resolution is not disposed of before 2 o'clock, I understand it will go to the Calendar.

Mr. TILLMAN. No, sir; we got unanimous consent that it shall go over, retaining its privileged position.

Mr. CULBERSON. That I did not understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It goes over until to-morrow, retaining its present place before the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, this is a very pretty quarrel, as it stands.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is no quarrel.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, well, it is an animated discussion, a feeling discussion on the part of the Senator from Rhode Island, and apparently a very feeling one on the part of the Senator from Iowa.

I came here yesterday expecting to get an opportunity to make a few remarks on the subject of the coal famine in general, not on the particular question under debate, the reduction of the tariff or the taking of it off. It was by my solicitation that this resolution went over, retaining its privileged position. I got the Senator from Rhode Island to secure that agreement.

It is not to be expected, I hope, that I could even lay down anything more than—well, you might say the headlines of a speech, in the brief time remaining before the regular order will come up.

Therefore, I shall have to very reluctantly forego the pleasure of discussing this question to-day, merely remarking that I do not intend to talk on the tariff at all, except possibly by way of illustration, as a side light, and as there seem to be live wires running around this Chamber I have one that I want to string out, which may or may not burn. If it does not burn, it will not be my fault. I intend to lay the blame for the existing pitiable, miserable, horrible condition at the door where it properly belongs—the President of the United States and his Attorney-General.

With that notice, and promising to be as liberal and as just as possible and to depend on facts and to deal in a calm, logical presentation of those facts and to restrain myself if possible in the use of the plainest words, without bitterness, I yield to the regular order, the Senator from Minnesota, whose great speech on the statehood bill has been thrilling this body for several days, and the people of the country are on tiptoe to hear the completion of it, so that they can read it. I will take the floor to-morrow as soon as this resolution comes up.

STATEHOOD BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. NELSON. In the latter part of my remarks yesterday, Mr. President, I took pains to call attention in detail to the character of the various treaties that had been made with the five nations of Indians in the Indian Territory, leading to their removal from their eastern lands to their lands in the Indian Territory. I called attention to those matters for the purpose of showing the Senate, how, in many instances, Congress has repeatedly disregarded those treaties in one form or another—entirely abrogated them.

One of the leading features in nearly all those treaties is the provision that none of their country, which originally included all of Oklahoma and Indian Territory, was to be included in any Territory or organized State of the United States. Another paragraph of those treaties allowed them to institute and maintain separate tribal governments and tribal courts. In fact, it gave them all the powers of self-government.

I afterwards called attention to the legislation which took place when Oklahoma Territory was established and the subsequent legislation for the purpose of showing how by that legislation we had again abrogated and changed the treaties with these Indians.

In connection with what I called attention to yesterday I beg briefly to refer to two other acts, the act of 1895 and the act of 1897, which gave more complete and enlarged jurisdiction to the Federal courts and deprived the local Indian courts of their old-time jurisdiction. Those courts had original jurisdiction in all controversies, not only between Indians inter se, but also in all controversy in which Indians were a party. By these acts we deprived them utterly of all their jurisdiction in these matters and left practically all controversies to the United States court in that Territory.

But in spite of our legislation with reference to that Territory matters grew worse and worse. The tension between the Indians and the white settlers grew more severe, and the situation became such that finally, in 1894, this body directed its committee on the Five Civilized Tribes to investigate the conditions in the Indian Territory. That committee, of which Senator TELLER was chairman, after a thorough investigation of the situation, made a most valuable report, and inasmuch as it has a bearing and is germane to the question in hand, I beg leave to quote some of the material portions of that report. This is what Senator TELLER said:

> As we have said, the title to these lands is held by the tribe in trust for the people. We have shown that this trust is not being properly executed, nor will it be if left to the Indians, and the question arises, what is the duty of the Government of the United States with reference to this trust? While we have recognized these tribes as dependent nations, the Government has likewise recognized its guardianship over the Indians and its obligations to protect them in their property and personal rights.
> In the treaty with the Cherokees, made in 1846, we stipulated that they should pass laws for equal protection, and for the security of life, liberty, and property. If the tribe fails to administer its trust properly by securing to all the people of the tribe equitable participation in the common property of the tribe, there appears to be no redress for the Indian so deprived of his rights, unless the Government does interfere to administer such trust.
> Is it possible because the Government has lodged the title in the tribe in trust that it is without power to compel the execution of the trust in accordance with the plain provisions of the treaty concerning such trust? Whatever power Congress possessed over the Indians as semidependent nations, or as persons within its jurisdiction, it still possesses, notwithstanding the several treaties may have stipulated that the Government would not exercise such power, and therefore Congress may deal with this question as if there had been no legislation save that which provided for the execution of the patent to the tribes.
> If the determination of the question whether the trust is or is not being properly executed is one for the courts and not for the legislative department of the Government then Congress can provide by law how such question shall be determined and how such trust shall be administered, if it is determined that it is not now being properly administered.

And here comes the material part:

> It is apparent to all—

The Senator says—

> It is apparent to all who are conversant with the present condition in the Indian Territory that their system of government can not continue. It is not only non-American, but it is radically wrong, and a change is imperatively demanded in the interest of the Indian and whites alike, and such change can not be much longer delayed. The situation grows worse and will continue to grow worse. There can be no modification of the system. It can not be reformed. It must be abandoned and a better one substituted. That it will be difficult to do your committee freely admit, but because it is a difficult task is no reason why Congress should not at the earliest possible moment address itself to this question.
> We do not care to at this time suggest what, in our judgment, will be the proper step for Congress to take on this matter, for the commission created by an act of Congress, and commonly known as the Dawes Commission, is now in the Indian Territory with the purpose of submitting to the several tribes of that Territory some proposition for the change in the present very unsatisfactory condition of that country. We prefer to wait and see whether this difficult and delicate subject may not be disposed of by an agreement with the several tribes of that Territory. But if the Indians decline to treat with that Commission and decline to consider any change in the present condition of their titles and government, the United States must, without their aid and without waiting for their approval, settle this question of the character and condition of their land tenures and establish a government over whites and Indians of that Territory in accordance with the principles of our Constitution and laws.

"And establish," he says, "a government over whites and Indians of that Territory in accordance with the principles of our Constitution and laws." Evidently Senator TELLER had no doubts as to the power of Congress in the premises.

The question as to the power of Congress to abrogate or modify these Indian treaties has been before the Supreme Court of the United States in several instances. There are four leading cases bearing on this question. The earliest was in the Supreme Court in 1870, the Cherokee Tobacco Case. The question presented by the record in that case grew out of a conflict between the Federal internal-revenue law and a provision in the Cherokee treaty. The case is found in 11 Wallace, on page 616. The Government attempted to levy and collect internal-revenue taxes on certain tobacco in the Cherokee Nation. The owners of the tobacco refused to pay the tax and the Government seized the tobacco and attempted to confiscate it. A suit was brought to test that question. The Supreme Court, in passing upon the question, states that—

> The only question argued in this court, and upon which our decision must depend, is the effect to be given respectively to the one hundred and seventh section of the act of 1866—

That is, the internal-revenue law—> and the tenth article of the treaty of 1866 between the United States and the Cherokee Nation of Indians.

> They are as follows.

This is the section of the law:

> SEC. 107. That the internal-revenue laws imposing taxes on distilled spirits, fermented liquors, tobacco, snuff, and cigars shall be construed to extend to such articles produced anywhere within the exterior boundaries of the United States, whether the same shall be within a collection district or not.

This is the provision of the treaty in conflict with that statute so far as this particular controversy was concerned, for it related to tobacco in the Cherokee Nation:

> ART. 10. Every Cherokee Indian and freed person residing in the Cherokee Nation shall have the right to sell any products of his farm, including his or her live stock, or any merchandise or manufactured products, and to ship and drive the same to market without restraint, paying any tax thereon which is now or may be levied by the United States on the quantity sold outside of the Indian Territory.

Two points were made in the case. The first point was that the provision of the internal-revenue law did not include the Indian Territory, that that Territory was excepted, and that the law imposing internal-revenue taxes did not apply to that country. The other point was, if it did apply it was in violation of the Cherokee treaty I have quoted from, and hence null and void. The court first decided that the law was general, that it included the Indian Territory, the Cherokee country, as well as all other portions of the United States, and then the court proceeded to say as to the other point:

> But conceding these views to be correct, it is insisted that the section can not apply to the Cherokee Nation because it is in conflict with the treaty. Undoubtedly one or the other must yield. The repugnancy is clear and they can not stand together.
> The second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States declares that "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land."
> It need hardly be said—

The court remarks—

> that a treaty can not change the Constitution or be held valid if it be in violation of that instrument. This results from the nature and fundamental principles of our Government. The effect of treaties and acts of Congress, when in conflict, is not settled by the Constitution. But the question is not involved in any doubt as to its proper solution. A treaty may supersede a prior act of Congress, and an act of Congress may supersede a prior treaty.

And cases are cited in the margin.

> In the cases referred to these principles were applied to treaties with foreign nations. Treaties with Indian nations within the jurisdiction of the United States, whatever considerations of humanity and good faith may be involved and require their faithful observance, can not be more obligatory. They have no higher sanctity, and no greater inviolability or immunity from legislative invasion can be claimed for them. The consequences in all such cases give rise to questions which must be met by the political department of the Government. They are beyond the sphere of judicial cognizance. In the case under consideration the act of Congress must prevail as if the treaty were not an element to be considered. If a wrong has been done, the power of redress is with Congress, not with the judiciary, and that body, upon being applied to, it is to be presumed, will promptly give the proper relief.

The next case bearing upon this question, Mr. President, arose under the act establishing Oklahoma Territory. When Oklahoma Territory was established it included a large part—I am not prepared at this moment to say just how much—of the land that was originally a part of the lands of the Cherokee Nation and on which friendly Indians had been settled and colonized. As soon as Oklahoma Territory was established the Territory proceeded to organize this country occupied exclusively by Indians and originally a part of the Indian reservation. It proceeded to include it in an organized county, and then it proceeded to tax the cattle of cattlemen grazing in that country. It seems the cattlemen had got authority through the Interior Department to graze their cattle there, and the Territory of Oklahoma undertook to tax those cattle, and the question was raised as to the right of the Territory to tax those cattle.

Upon this question I will quote the language of the court. Many technical questions, I might say, were raised in that case, but one of the leading questions was whether this particular territory, where these cattle were grazing, which had been organized into a county in Oklahoma Territory, and where they had attempted to tax the cattle of the cattlemen was amenable to the laws of Oklahoma Territory, and whether this proceeding, including the act establishing the Territory and all the subsequent acts with reference to such taxation, were not a violation of the treaty with the Cherokees. The court says in this connection:

> It is, indeed, true that the lands in question, constituting the reservations of the Osage Kansas Indians, are portions of lands previously granted by patent of the United States, in pursuance of the treaty of May 6, 1828 (7 Stat., 311), and of the treaty of December 29, 1835 (7 Stat., 478), to the Cherokee Nation of Indians, and that it was provided in those treaties that the lands so granted should not, without the consent of the Indians, at any future time be "included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory."

And then, coming to this precise question—many other questions are discussed in the opinion—the court proceeds to say:

> It is alleged that by no subsequent treaty have either the Cherokee or the Osage or Kansas Indians consented that the lands here in question should be included within the limits or jurisdiction of the Territory of Oklahoma; and it is accordingly now contended that under the provision contained in the Cherokee treaties the lands therein designated should never be embraced within the limits of a Territory or State without the consent of said Indians. The exemption or right thereby created runs with the land, subject to which said lands, or any part thereof, could be conveyed to other Indians, and is not a right belonging solely to the Cherokees, which ceased to exist when the ownership of the Cherokees therein terminated.

Then the court proceeds:

> Whether, without express stipulation to that effect, the right granted by treaty to the Cherokee Nation to be exempt as to their lands from inclusion within the limits of any Territory or State passed with the grant of a portion of such lands to the Osage and Kansas Indians we need not consider, because if such were the law it is conceded that the United States have, by the act of May 2, 1890 (26 Stat., 81), creating the Territory of Oklahoma, included these Osage and Kansas Indian lands within the geographical limits of said Territory.
> It is well settled that an act of Congress may supersede a prior treaty, and that any questions that may arise are beyond the sphere of judicial cognizance and must be met by the political department of the Government.
> It need hardly be said that a treaty can not change the Constitution, or be held valid if it be in violation of that instrument. This results from the nature and fundamental principles of our Government. The effect of treaties and acts of Congress, when in conflict, is not settled by the Constitution. But the question is not involved in any doubt as to its proper solution. A treaty may supersede a prior act of Congress, and an act of Congress may supersede a prior treaty. (Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. 253, 314; Taylor v. Morton, 2 Curtis, 454.)
> In the cases referred to these principles were applied to treaties with foreign nations. Treaties with Indian nations within the jurisdiction of the United States, whatever considerations of humanity and good faith may be involved and require their faithful observance, can not be obligatory. * * * In the case under consideration the act of Congress must prevail, as if the treaty were not an element to be considered.

The first case I cited arose out of a conflict between the internal-revenue laws and the Cherokee treaty. The next case, the case I have just read, is the case of Thomas v. Gay (169 U. S. Reports, p. 264). That case arose out of the conflict between the act creating and establishing Oklahoma Territory and the old treaty with the Cherokee Indians.

We have another case, and a very recent one, growing out of the so-called Curtis Act, passed in 1898. That act involved material changes and abrogation of older treaties. Among other things under the Curtis Act, the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to lease the lands of the Indians, and he proceeded to lease certain lands. The Indians of the Cherokee Nation raised the question and brought a suit before the Supreme Court as to whether his attempt under the Curtis Act to lease any of those Indian lands was not in violation of former treaties. This case was decided December 1, 1902. I read from the record:

> This cause was begun on the equity side of the supreme court of the District of Columbia. The complainants named in the bill were the Cherokee Nation and its principal chief and treasurer and sundry other citizens of the nation, suing on behalf of themselves and of citizens of the nation residing in the Indian Territory. Ethan A. Hitchcock, as Secretary of the Interior, was made sole defendant. It was claimed in the bill that, by virtue of certain treaties and a patent based thereon, the Cherokee Nation was vested with a fee-simple title to its tribal lands in the Indian Territory, and it was also averred that, by a treaty executed in 1835, there was secured to the nation the right, by its national council, to make and carry into effect all such laws as the Cherokees might deem necessary for the government and protection of the persons and property within their own country belonging to their people, or such persons as had connected themselves with them. A synopsis of the pertinent portions of the treaties above referred to is set out in the margin.

Among which are the treaties to which I referred in my statement yesterday.

> The patent referred to in the bill was executed on December 31, 1838. It conveyed to the Cherokee Nation the lands secured and guaranteed by the treaties of 1828, 1833, and 1835. In the patent the 7,000,000-acre tract, together with the perpetual outlet, was described as one tract, aggregating 13,574,135.14 acres. In addition the patent specified the boundaries of a tract of 800,000 acres ceded by the treaty of 1835.

Then the bill of complaint, after quoting from those agreements, went on:

> Averring that the Cherokee Nation and its citizens possessed the exclusive right to the use, control, and occupancy of its tribal lands, it was alleged that the Secretary of the Interior, without having lawful authority so to do, was assuming the power to and was about to pass favorably upon applications for leases, and was about to grant leases of lands belonging to said nation for the purpose of mining for oil, gas, coal, and other minerals, one such successful applicant being stated to be The Cherokee Oil and Gas Company, an Arkansas corporation. Based upon general allegations of the absence of an adequate remedy at law, the necessity of relief to avoid a multiplicity of suits and to prevent the casting of a cloud upon the title of the nation to its said lands, and the claim that irreparable injury would be caused and wrong and oppression result, and that there would be a deprivation of property rights of the complainants and of other citizens of the Cherokee Nation, an injunction was prayed against further action by the Secretary of the Interior in the premises.

The opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice White. Upon this question the court proceeded, as follows:

As the acts done and contemplated to be done by the appellee and assailed by the bill of complaint, are presumably not the subject of criticism, in the event that the act of June 28, 1898—was a constitutional and valid exercise of power by Congress, we will now address ourselves to a consideration of that statute.

Prior to the act of March 3, 1871 (16 Stat., 544, 566, now section 2079 of the Revised Statutes), which statute, in effect, voiced the intention of Congress thereafter to make the Indian tribes amenable directly to the power and authority of the laws of the United States by the immediate exercise of its legislative power over them, the customary mode of dealing with the Indian tribes was by treaty. As, however, held in Cherokee Nation v. Southern Kansas Railway Co. (135 U. S., 641, 653, reaffirmed in Stephens v. Cherokee Nation, 174 U. S., 445, 484), while the Cherokee Nation and other Indian tribes domiciled within the United States had been recognized by the United States as separate communities, and engagements entered into with them by means of formal treaties, they were yet regarded as in a condition of pupilage or dependency, and subject to the paramount authority of the United States.

Reviewing decisions of this court rendered prior to the act of 1871, and par ticularly considering the status of the very tribe of Indians affected by the present litigation, the court commented upon a declaration made in a previous decision that this Government had "admitted, by the most solemn sanction, the existence of the Indians as a separate and distinct people, and as being invested with rights which constitute them a State, or separate community." It was observed of this declaration that it fell "far short of saying that they are a sovereign State, with no superior within the limits of its territory." Considering the treaty of 1835 with the Cherokee Nation, under which it is now claimed, on behalf of the appellants, that the Cherokees became vested with the sole control over the lands ceded to them, the court observed (p. 485):

"By the treaty of New Echota, 1835, the United States covenanted and agreed that the lands ceded to the Cherokee Nation should at no future time, without their consent, be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory, and that the Government would secure to that nation 'the right by their national councils to make and carry into effect all such laws as they may deem necessary for the government of the persons and property within their own country, belonging to their people or such persons as have connected themselves with them;' and, by the treaties, of Washington, 1846 and 1866, the United States guaranteed to the Cherokees the title and possession of their lands, and jurisdiction over their country. (Revision of Indian Treaties, pp. 65, 79, 85). But neither these nor any previous treaties evinced any intention, upon the part of the Government, to discharge them from their condition of pupilage or dependency, and constitute them a separate, independent, sovereign people, with no superior within its limits."

It results then from the doctrine of the decisions of this court that the demurrer was properly sustained, because of the fact that the matters named in the bill were matters of administration, to which the act of June 28 was applicable, and they were solely cognizable by the executive department of the Government. The decision in Stephens v. Cherokee Nation (174 U. S., 445) is particularly in point, as that case involved the validity of the very act under consideration, and the precedent correlative legislation, wherein the United States practically assumed the full control over the Cherokees, as well as the other nations constituting the Five Civilized Tribes, and took upon itself the determination of membership in the tribes for the purpose of adjusting their rights in the tribal property. The plenary power of control by Congress over the Indian tribes and its undoubted power to legislate, as it had done through the act of 1898, directly for the protection of the tribal property, was in that case reaffirmed.

Then the court quotes from the opinion and continues:

The holding that Congress had power to provide a method for determining membership in the Five Civilized Tribes and for ascertaining the citizenship thereof preliminary to a division of the property of the tribe among its members necessarily involved the further holding that Congress was vested with authority to adopt measures to make the tribal property productive and secure therefrom an income for the benefit of the tribe.

Whatever title the Indians have is in the tribe, and not in the individuals, although held by the tribe for the common use and equal benefit of all the members. (The Cherokee Trust Funds, 117 U. S., 288, 308.) The manner in which this land is held is described in Cherokee Nation v. Journeycake (155 U. S., 196, 207), where this court, referring to the treaties and the patent mentioned in the bill of complaint herein, said: "Under these treaties, and in December, 1838, a patent was issued to the Cherokees for these lands. By that patent whatever of title was conveyed was conveyed to the Cherokees as a nation, and no title was vested in severalty in the Cherokees or any of them.

"We are not concerned in this case with the question whether the act of June 28, 1898, and the proposed action thereunder, which is complained of, is or is not wise and calculated to operate beneficially to the interests of the Cherokees. The power existing in Congress to administer upon and guard the tribal property, and the power being political and administrative in its nature, the manner of its exercise is a question within the province of the legislative branch to determine, and is not one for the courts."

This decision was under the Curtis Act. There is a recent case relating to these same lands, although not involving directly the validity of those ancient treaties, but involving the same questions as to the power of Congress to abrogate Indian treaties. It is a case decided last week, January 5, 1903—the case of Lone Wolf, Principal Chief of the Kiowas et al., appellants, v. Ethan A. Hitchcock, Secretary of the Interior et al. I quote from the record:

In 1867 a treaty was concluded with the Kiowa and Comanche tribes of Indians, and such other friendly tribes as might be united with them, setting apart a reservation for the use of such Indians. By a separate treaty the Apache tribe of Indians was incorporated with the two former named and became entitled to share in the benefits of the reservation. (15 Stat., 581, 589.)

I will not take up time to read all the details of the case, but I will come at once to the gist of the matter. I read from the opinion of Mr. Justice White:

By the sixth article of the first of the two treaties referred to in the preceding statement, proclaimed on August 25, 1868 (15 Stat., 581), it was provided that heads of families of the tribes affected by the treaty might select, within the reservation, a tract of land of not exceeding 320 acres in extent, which should thereafter cease to be held in common and should be for the exclusive possession of the Indian making the selection, so long as he or his family might continue to cultivate the land. The twelfth article reads as follows:

"ART. 12. No treaty for the cession of any portion or part of the reservation herein described, which may be held in common, shall be of any validity or force as against the said Indians unless executed and signed by at least three-fourths of all the adult male Indians occupying the same, and no cession by the tribe shall be understood or construed in such manner as to deprive, without his consent, any individual member of the tribe of his rights to any tract of land selected by him as provided in Article III (VI) of this treaty."

The appellants base their right to relief on the proposition that by the effect of the article just quoted the confederated tribes of Kiowas, Comanches, and Apaches were vested with an interest in the lands held in common within the reservation, which interest could not be divested by Congress in any other mode than that specified in the said twelfth article, and that as a result of the said stipulation the interest of the Indians in the common lands fell within the protection of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and such interest, indirectly, at least, came under the control of the judicial branch of the Government. We are unable—to yield our assent to this view.

The contention in effect ignores the status of the contracting Indians and the relation of dependency they bore and continue to bear toward the Government of the United States. To uphold the claim would be to adjudge that the indirect operation of the treaty was to materially limit and qualify the controlling authority of Congress in respect to the care and protection of the Indians, and to deprive Congress, in a possible emergency when the necessity might be urgent for a partition and disposal of the tribal lands, of all power to act if the assent of the Indians could not be obtained.

Now, it is true that in decisions of this court, the Indian right of occupancy of tribal lands, whether declared in a treaty or otherwise created, has been stated to be sacred, or, as sometimes expressed, as sacred as the fee of the United States in the same lands. (Johnson v. McIntosh (1823), 8 Wheat., 543, 574; Cherokee Nation v. Georgia (1831), 5 Pet., 1, 48; Worcester v. Georgia (1832), 6 Pet., 515, 581; United States v. Cook (1873), 19 Wall., 591, 592; Leavenworth, etc., R. R. Co. v. United States (1875), 92 U. S., 733, 755; Beecher v. Wetherby (1877), 95 U. S., 525.) But in none of these cases was there involved a controversy between Indians and the Government respecting the power of Congress to administer the property of the Indians.

The questions considered in the cases referred to, which either directly or indirectly had relation to the nature of the property rights of the Indians, concerned the character and extent of such rights as respected States or individuals. In one of the cited cases it was clearly pointed out that Congress possessed a paramount power over the property of the Indians, by reason of its exercise of guardianship over their interest, and that such authority might be implied, even though opposed to the strict letter of a treaty with the Indians. Thus, in Beecher v. Wetherby (95 U. S., 525) discussing the claim that there had been a prior reservation of land by treaty to the use of a certain tribe of Indians, the court said (p. 525):

"But the right which the Indians held was only that of occupancy. The fee was in the United States, subject to that right, and could be transferred by them whenever they chose. The grantee, it is true, would take only the naked fee, and could not disturb the occupancy of the Indians; that occupancy could only be interfered with or determined by the United States. It is to be presumed that in this matter the United States would be governed by such considerations of justice as would control a Christian people in their treatment of an ignorant and dependent race. Be that as it may, the propriety or justice of their action towards the Indians with respect to their lands is a question of governmental policy, and is not a matter open to discussion in a controversy between third parties, neither of whom derives title from the Indians."

Plenary authority over the tribal relations of the Indians has been exercised by Congress from the beginning, and the power has always been deemed a political one, not subject to be controlled by the judicial department of the Government.

I have already referred to the Curtis Act passed in 1898, subsequent to the establishment of Oklahoma Territory, and the acts of 1895 and 1897. The Curtis Act was the most important piece of legislation in reference to the Indian Territory and the solution and final settlement of the Indian problems in that Territory. I have just called the attention of the Senate to how a question arose under that act, in a case which came to the Supreme Court, where it was alleged that there was a conflict between the Curtis Act and the old treaties with those Indians, wherein the court said that the subsequent act, the Curtis Act, was paramount; that whatever conflict there was between that act and the treaty, the rteaty must yield.

In this connection I desire to quote in a brief manner some of the leading provisions of the Curtis Act in order that the Senate may have full information in the premises; but before I proceed to do so I will briefly call attention to the so-called Dawes Commission, which was created by section 16 of the act of March 3, 1893. The section in regard to the appointment of that Commission provided that the Commission were to be empowered—

To enter into negotiations with the Five Civilized Tribes for the purpose of extinguishing the national or tribal title to lands either by cession or allotment or by such other method as might be agreed upon. The Commission was to endeavor to secure provision for the suitable allotment of lands in severalty to the different Indians and to procure the cession of the lands not requisite for allotments, etc.

I will now call attention to the act of June 23, 1898, the Curtis Act. Some of the provisions of that act bearing on the case under consideration are as follows:

In criminal prosecutions against officials for embezzlement, bribery, etc., the word "officer" shall include officers of the various tribes or nations,

This was an abrogation of the old treaties. The officers of the different Indian nations were wholly amenable for negligence or maladministration to their own tribal governments. This made them liable under the criminal laws of the United States. It said the word "officer" shall include the officers of the various tribes or nations.

When the property of any tribe is affected by the issue of any suit, the tribe is to be made a party.

That is new.

Jurisdiction is given to the United States courts in the Territory to pass upon the claims of citizenship or membership in the respective tribes and claims to property as such in the tribes.

That is an innovation of their old tribal rights.

By section 11, when the roll of citizenship of any one of said nations is completed and the survey of the land finished, the Dawes Commission shall proceed to make allotments, etc.

Provision is made for the leasing of oil, coal, asphalt, and other mineral lands in the Territory.

Provision is also made for the incorporation of towns and cities and the election of officers thereof, and the establishment of schools, and for these purposes the laws of the State of Arkansas are applied and extended.

Provision is made for surveying and laying out town sites and for the disposal of the lots.

Provision is also made for making up the rolls of citizenship, including that of freedmen, and rules are laid down for the establishment of such citizenship.

Leasing of agricultural or grazing lands after the 1st of January, 1898, by the tribes or any member thereof is absolutely prohibited and declared null and void, and all such leases, made prior to that time, shall terminate on the 1st of April, 1899.

Section 26 provides that after the passage of the act the laws of the various tribes or nations of Indians shall not be enforced at law or in equity by the courts of the United States in Indian Territory.

That was a radical change and innovation—an abrogation of the old treaties.

Section 28 provides:

That on the 1st day of July, 1898, all tribal courts in Indian Territory shall be abolished, and no officers of said courts shall thereafter have any authority whatever to do or perform any act theretofore authorized by any law in connection with said courts, or to receive any pay for same; and all civil and criminal causes then pending in any such court shall be transferred to the United States court in said Territory by filing with the clerk of the court the original papers in the suit: Provided, That this section shall not be in force as to the Chickasaw, Choctaw, and Creek tribes or nations until the 1st day of October 1898

Now, up to this time, Mr. President, they had had in each of these nations the tribal courts—courts which adjudicated and passed upon all controversies between the different nations, and controversies between the citizens or members of one nation and of another nation, and controversies between the several members of a nation among themselves. This provision entirely abrogated and wiped out these tribal courts and transferred all suits into the United States courts—a clear abrogation of former treaties.

Section 29 of this act contains a ratification of an agreement between the Dawes Commission and the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes providing for allotments of land, etc., giving various details; also provides for the right of way of railroads. Provision is also made for the laying out of town sites and for the operation of coal, asphalt, and other mines.

Provision is also made for the jurisdiction of United States courts in certain cases.

Provision is made for the continuance of the tribal governments for eight years from the 4th of March, 1898.

Section 30 provides for the ratification of an agreement with the Creek Indians. This agreement contains provisions for the allotment of land for town sites. Also for the jurisdiction of courts.

By the act of February 18, 1901 (31 Stat., p. 794), certain provisions of the laws of Arkansas, in relation to corporations, etc., are extended to and put in force in the Indian Territory.

By the act of March 3, 1901 (chapter 868, 31 Stat., p. 1447), every Indian in the Indian Territory is made a citizen of the United States.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to one fact. While it is the general rule in relation to the Indians of this country that the Indians do not become citizens until the allotments of lands have been made to them in severalty, in the matter of the Indian Territory the act of 1901, which I have quoted, makes every Indian in that Territory, regardless of whether he has had an allotment made to him or not, a full citizen of the United States.

I have thus cited and referred to these several provisions for the purpose of calling attention to how repeatedly and how frequently, by legislation and otherwise, the Government has abrogated, modified, or changed these old treaties and arrangements with the Indians against their consent, and how in every instance where these changes, or abrogations, or violations of old treaties have been brought to the attention of the Supreme Court of the United States that tribunal has upheld the power of Congress in the premises.

I have called attention to the decision of the court growing out of the conflict between the internal-revenue laws of 1866 and the Cherokee treaty, the first case of the kind which brought up the question directly before the Supreme Court, wherein the court upheld the power of Congress. The next case grew up under the act establishing Oklahoma Territory, where there was a clear invasion and violation of former treaties; and in that case the courts sustained the power of Congress. In the subsequent case growing out of an attempt on the part of the Secretary of the Interior to lease lands under the so-called Curtis Act of 1898, again the Supreme Court sustained the power of Congress. In the recent case which was decided last week, the Kiowa and Comanche case, the Supreme Court again sustained the power of Congress; and so, Mr. President, it is no longer an open or unsettled question as to our plenary power in the premises.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me for a moment?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The object of my interruption is only to elicit information from the Senator from Minnesota, who is delivering a remarkably able and instructive speech upon this subject, for which everyone ought to be obliged to him. There is no doubt, of course, under the decisions cited by the Senator from Minnesota, that Congress has the power to abrogate treaties made with Indians as Congress has the power to abrogate treaties made with foreign nations, so far as the question of power is concerned. In other words, the courts have held that under the Constitution a treaty is the law of the land, but it differs in magnitude or importance from no other law in that respect. We can make a law and we can abrogate it. But power is one thing, as my friend knows, and the moral right to exercise the power is another. If we abrogate a treaty with a foreign country, although we have the power to do it, the Supreme Court has often said we do it at our peril. If we abrogate a treaty with the Indians, we abrogate it at our peril. but the peril is so little that it amounts to nothing.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has not lived among the Indians.

Mr. SPOONER. I have lived in the neighborhood of the Indians and I served in the Army among the Indians, but in this day the peril is not so great. That leads me to the question which I want to ask the Senator, whether there is any moral obstruction, any principle of honor——

Mr. NELSON. There is no question of honor at all. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] ably answered the question yesterday.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not hear the Senator from Connecticut. I know if he did it he did it ably. I did not know but that the Senator intended to refer to that phase of it.

Mr. NELSON. I did refer to one feature of it, and the Senator from Connecticut supplemented in a most emphatic and powerful manner a part of the argument I made. The moral phase of the question is this: By the invitation, express and implied, of the Indians, 400,000 white people have gone into that Territory. They have built towns, churches, public buildings, and railroads. They have improved the country. They have made it one of the richest and most prosperous portions of America. They have enriched the Indians. They have gone there by the consent and permission of the Indians, and in view of the great task they have performed in that country the Indians are morally and equitably estopped from denying their right to organize a government. Those 400,000 people, our own kith and kin, as good people as there are in any State or Territory, are in the Indian Territory, and they have no local government except in a few of the town sites. They are without schools, except in a few instances. They have no county or township government of any kind. They are utterly helpless, more helpless than any class of people within our territorial possessions. Even in the Philippine Islands an American citizen is more protected by law and authority than in the Indian country.

I insist that it is our moral duty, a duty which we owe those people, to see to it that they get an organized government as soon as possible, and that the Indians, in all conscience and all equity, are estopped from protesting and objecting to it. Those white people have created the great wealth of that country. Had not those 400,000 white people gone into that Territory it would have been a sleepy hollow of Indian nations. There would have been no great prosperous towns and no great wealth. The wealth that is there to-day, the great prosperity that is there to-day, were brought there and created by the white people who are in the Territory; and by their efforts they have made those Indians the richest people in all this country. There is no class of people, even in my own State or the State of the Senator from Wisconsin, as wealthy as the average member of the Five Civilized Nations.

Mr. SPOONER. My friend does not understand me as antagnizing him?

Mr. NELSON. Not at all.

Mr. SPOONER. I heard read here a day or two ago a protest from the tribes, in which they insisted that under existing treaties they were entitled to tribal government until 1906.

Mr. NELSON. This does not interfere with tribal government.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator has investigated the subject, and I have not. I am asking merely for information.

Mr. NELSON. By the last treaties made with them we did not agree that tribal government should remain, but we said tribal government should end at a certain time; that is all.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator says they have all been made citizens of the United States.

Mr. NELSON. They have all been made citizens of the United States by the act of 1901. Before I commenced to probe the subject it was my impression that no Indians were citizens except under the general allotment law, which made them citizens only when allotments had been made to them.

Mr. SPOONER. That is the general rule.

Mr. NELSON. That is the general rule applying to all Indians in this country. I was not aware that there had been a wholesale naturalization of Indians in the Indian Territory till I found this law, but if you will examine the law you will find that by the act of 1901 every Indian in those nations is a citizen of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. That is not against their protest?

Mr. NELSON. I never heard of any protest.

Mr. SPOONER. That makes a very strong position, because it would seem that Congress would have a right——

Mr. NELSON. I want to say further that that is not all, but that the bulk of the Indians, except a few of those chiefs whom I used to see swarming around the Capitol when I was a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs in the other body—with the exception of a few of those who hung around Washington and got money out of the rank and file of the Indians and grew fat—the rank and file of the Indian people want statehood just as bad as the white people there, because statehood will protect them against those of their own kind who have been growing fat and living upon them in years past.

Mr. SPOONER. It would seem to be very odd if Congress had not power to organize a republican government for citizens of the United States anywhere in the United States.

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I thank the Senator for his suggestion.

Mr. NELSON. I now come to the present status in the Indian Territory, and to what has been accomplished. I desire to read from the last report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. In his last annual report he states:

INDIAN TERRITORY UNDER THE CURTIS ACT AND SUBSEQUENT LEGISLATION—AGREEMENTS.

Three agreements have been negotiated during the last fiscal year: One with the Cherokees, approved July 1, 1902 (32 Stats., 716), ratified by them August 7, and proclaimed by the President August 12; one with the Choctaws and Chickasaws, approved July 1, 1902 (32 Stats., 641), and ratified September 25; and one with the Creeks, approved June 30, 1902 (32 Stats., 500), ratified by them July 26, and proclaimed by the President August 8.

He adds:

There seems to be no necessity for any further agreements with these nations or with the other nation of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and there appears to be no reason why the work of making rolls and allotting lands in severalty should not proceed with rapidity under these new agreements.

Now, Mr. President, in this connection I have a brief or a statement prepared by the Indian Office by which I propose to show the effect of the recent treaties and agreements with the Indians in respect to lands and rights of members of these different nations. This memorandum was prepared at the Indian Office.

CREEK AGREEMENTS.

Section 46 of the Creek agreement, ratified by the act of March 1, 1901 (31 Stat., 861), declares that the tribal government shall not continue—

I call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that there is not a covenant that it shall continue, but there is a covenant that it shall not continue any longer. It declares that—the tribal government shall not continue longer than March 4, 1906.

Mr. SPOONER. What is that?

Mr. NELSON. I refer to the Creek agreement. I am giving a summary of the effect of material portions of recent agreements made with the Indians—the agreements that are now in force, under which they are closing out the matter, under which they have made allotments and are making allotments. I will repeat this statement. It was prepared by the Indian Office:

CREEK AGREEMENTS.

Section 46 of the Creek agreement, ratified by the act of March 1, 1901 (31 Stats., 861), declares that the tribal government shall not continue longer than March 4, 1906, subject to such further legislation as Congress may deem proper.

Section 16 of the Creek agreement, ratified by the act approved June 30, 1902 (32 Stats., 500), is as follows:

"Lands allotted to citizens shall not in any manner whatever or at any time be encumbered, taken, or sold to secure or satisfy any debt or obligation nor be alienated by the allottee or his heirs before the expiration of five years from the date of the approval of this supplemental agreement, except with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. Each citizen shall select from his allotment 40 acres of land, or a quarter of a quarter section, as a homestead, which shall be and remain nontaxable, inalienable, and free from any incumbrance whatever for twenty-one years from the date of the deed therefor, and a separate deed shall be issued to each allottee for his homestead, in which this condition shall appear." * * *

"It will be observed that citizens of the Creek Nation can not dispose of any part of their allotments until after the expiration of five years from the date of the approval of the agreement except with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. The section above quoted provides that each citizen shall select a homestead, which shall be nontaxable and inalienable for twenty-one years from the date of the deed. The remainder of the land allotted to each Creek citizen would undoubtedly become subject to taxation at the expiration of five years from the date of the approval of the agreement, and if any part of the same were sold with the consent of the Secretary it would unquestionably become taxable as soon as the Indian title was extinguished, if not before. (Allotted lands may be leased, sec. 17, p. 5, of last agreement.)

CHEROKEE AGREEMENTS.

"Sections 13, 14, and 15 of the Cherokee agreement, approved by the act of July 1, 1902 (32 Stats., 716), are as follows:

"13. Each member of said tribe shall, at the time of the selection of his allotment, designate as a homestead out of said allotment land equal in value to 40 acres of the average allotable lands of the Cherokee Nation, as nearly as may be, which shall be inalienable during the lifetime of the allottee, not exceeding twenty-one years from the date of the certificate of allotment. Separate certificate shall issue for said homestead. During the time said homestead is held by the allottee the same shall be nontaxable and shall not be liable for any debt contracted by the owner thereof while so held by him.

"14. Lands allotted to citizens shall not in any manner whatever or at any time be encumbered, taken, or sold to secure or satisfy any debt or obligation, or be alienated by the allottee or his heirs, before the expiration of five years from the date of the ratification of this act.

"15. All lands allotted to the members of said tribe, except such land as is set aside to each for a homestead as herein provided, shall be alienable in five years after issuance of patent.

"Section 63 of this agreement declares that the tribal government shall not continue longer than March 4, 1906.

Again I call your attention to the fact that there is no agreement that the tribal governments are to continue that long. It simply says that they shall not continue any longer.

"It will be observed that section 14 provides that the land allotted to Cherokee citizens shall not be subject to any incumbrance or sale before the expiration of five years from the date of the ratification of the act, while section 15 provides that all of the lands allotted to a citizen, except the homestead, may be alienated 'in five years after issuance of patent.'

"Proceeding on the theory that the land would not be taxable until title of the citizen had been extinguished, lands in this nation would not be subject to taxation—at least, until five years from the date of the ratification of the agreement. Alloted lands may be leased, section 72, page 12, of agreement.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW AGREEMENTS.

"The Choctaw and Chickasaw agreement approved by act of June 28, 1898 (30 Stats., 495), generally known as the Curtis Act, provides that—

"It is further agreed, in view of the modification of legislative authority and judicial jurisdiction herein provided, and the necessity of the continuance of the tribal governments so modified, in order to carry out the requirements of this agreement, that the same shall continue for the period of eight years from the 4th day of March, 1898.

"Sections 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16 of the Choctaw and Chickasaw agreement, approved by the act of July 1, 1902 (32 Stats., 641), are as follows:

12. Each member of said tribe shall, at the time of the selection of his allotment, designate as a homestead out of said allotment land equal in value to 160 acres of the average allottable land of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, as nearly as may be, which shall be inalienable during the lifetime of the allottee, not exceeding twenty-one years from the date of certificate of allotment, and separate certificate and patent shall issue for said homestead.

13. The allotment of each Choctaw and Chickasaw freedman shall be inalienable during the lifetime of the allottee, not exceeding twenty-one years from the date of certificate of allotment.

14. When allotments as herein provided have been made to all citizens and freedmen, the residue of lands not herein reserved or otherwise disposed of, if any there be, shall be sold at public auction under rules and regulations and on terms to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and so much of the proceeds as may be necessary for equalizing allotments shall be used for that purpose, and the balance shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Choctaws and Chickasaws and distributed per capita as other funds of the tribes.

15. Lands allotted to members and freedmen shall not be affected or encumbered by any deed, debt, or obligation of any character contracted prior to the time at which said land may be alienated under this act, nor shall said lands be sold except as herein provided.

16. All lands allotted to the members of said tribes, except such land as is set aside to each for a homestead as herein provided, shall be alienable after issuance of patent, as follows: One-fourth in acreage in one year, one-fourth in acreage in three years, and the balance in five years; in each case from the date of the patent: Provided, That such land shall not be alienable by the allottee or his heirs at any time before the expiration of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribal governments for less than its appraised value.

"Sections 56 to 63, inclusive, of the agreement last above mentioned relate to the sale of coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations.

"Section 58 provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall, within six months after the final ratification of the agreement, ascertain, 'so far as may be practicable, what lands are principally valuable because of their deposits of coal or asphalt, including therein all lands which at the time of the final ratification of this agreement shall be covered by then existing coal or asphalt leases, and within that time he shall, by a written order, segregate and reserve from allotment all of said lands.' This section further provides that this total segregation and reservation shall not exceed 500,000 acres.

"The Choctaw and Chickasaw agreement approved by the act of June 28, 1898, provides that—"All the lands allotted shall be nontaxable while the title remains in the original allottee, but not to exceed twenty-one years from date of patent, and each allottee shall select from his allotment a homestead of 160 acres, for which he shall have a separate patent, and which shall be inalienable for twenty-one years from date of patent. This provision shall also apply to the Choctaw and Chickasaw freedman to the extent of his allotment.

"Construing these two agreements together as a whole, it would seem that the lands allotted to members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes would not be subject to taxation 'while the title remains in the original allottee, but not exceeding twenty-one years from date of patent,' unless it can be held that under the provisions of section 68 of the supplemental agreement, as follows:

"No act of Congress or treaty provision, nor any provision of the Atoka agreement, inconsistent with this agreement shall be in force in said Choctaw and Chickasaw nations—the provisions of the quotation last above made from the agreement of June 28, 1898, are inconsistent with the provisions of the supplemental agreement.

"SEMINOLE AGREEMENTS.

"The agreement with the Seminoles approved July 1, 1898 (30 Stats., 567), provides that 'All contracts for sale, disposition, or incumbrance of any part of any allotment made prior to date of patent shall be void.' This agreement also provides that—

"When the tribal government shall cease to exist, the principal chief last elected by said tribe shall execute, under his hand and the seal of the nation, and deliver to each allottee a deed conveying to him all the right, title, and interest of the said nation and the members thereof in and to the lands so allotted to him, and the same shall thereupon operate as a relinquishment of the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the land embraced in said conveyance, and as a guarantee by the United States of the title of said lands to the allottee; and the acceptance of such deed by the allottee shall be a relinquishment of his title to and interest in all other lands belonging to the tribe, except such as may have been excepted from allotment and held in common for other purposes. Each allottee shall designate one tract of 40 acres, which shall, by the terms of the deed, be made inalienable and nontaxable as a homestead in perpetuity."

"This agreement, it will be seen, provides that the homestead, in perpetuity, shall be nontaxable. Therefore it would seem that all the lands allotted to Seminole citizens except the homestead would become subject to taxation, under any circumstances, when the tribal government shall have ceased to exist.

"In the case of the United States v. Railroad Company it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States that 'A tax is understood to be a charge and a peculiar burden for the support of Government.' (17 Wall., 322–326).

"In the case of Perry v. Washburn, the Supreme Court of the State of California held that a tax is a charge upon persons of property to raise money for public purposes; it is not founded upon contract and does not establish the relation of debtor and creditor between the tax payer and the State (20 Cal., 318).

"From the above quotations it will be seen that the agreements with the Creeks, Cherokees, and Seminoles specifically declare that the homestead shall be nontaxable. If we apply the doctrine of inclusio unius est, exclusio alterius (the inclusion of one is the exclusion of another), it would seem that in these nations all of the lands except the homesteads would become liable to taxation as soon as a State government is established in the Indian Territory.

"If the provisions of the two agreements with the Choctaws and Chickasaws are consistent, it would appear that all of the lands allotted to the members of the two tribes would be nontaxable as long as the title remained in the original allottee, not, however, exceeding twenty-one years. The coal and asphalt lands would unquestionably become subject to taxation as soon as the Indian title became extinguished—that is, when the lands were sold—as would also the residue of the lands not 'reserved or otherwise disposed of' mentioned in section 14 of the agreement approved July 1, 1902."

Mr. President, from this summary will be seen the present condition and state of the allotments which have been made in that Territory. It is obvious from reading this summary and considering the work of the Dawes Commission that most of the work in the matter of allotments, segregating lands, setting them apart for the Indians has taken place. While one of the treaties contains a provision that the tribal governments may continue until 1908, in the other cases it is simply permissive. But I insist that it is unfair and unjust to the 400,000 white people who are living in that Territory without any government at all to keep them waiting until 1908 for the expiration of these tribal governments.

Placing the people of the Indian Territory in the condition of statehood with Oklahoma will in no manner interfere with or disturb the tribal governments, but, as a matter of fact, it is for the advantage and benefit and interest of the Indians that the tribal governments shall cease immediately. The Indians are now citizens of the United States, and nearly all of them—all of them with but a very few exceptions—are as competent to participate in self-government as most of the other citizens of that Territory. They are to a large extent white men, some of them with a little Indian blood, just enough to have connection with the tribes by means of blood. Others, again, are members of the nations by marriage, and some by adoption, but the great majority of the nation—90 per cent of the people—are as competent and as well qualified to participate in a State government, in county, township, and local government, as are the other people of that Territory.

It is no injustice and it is no hardship to give them such a government. On the contrary, it is a great blessing to them. The provisions of the substitute we reported in no manner interferes with the relations between the Government of the United States and the Indian nations in the matter of perfecting, consummating, and carrying out their allotments of land.

It is claimed that a good deal of the property of this Territory is tied up and will not be taxable for a great many years. I propose now to read a statement I have carefully compiled from the reports of the Dawes Commission and from the reports of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs as to the conditions of land in that Territory, what lands are alienable and what are not alienable, and what restrictions there are upon alienation, and also what lands are taxable and what are not taxable.

SEMINOLE NATION.

Take the Seminole Nation. The total acreage of land of that nation is 365,851.57; reserved for town sites, schools, churches, railroad right of way, 2,272.65; acres subject to allotment, 363,578.92; acres already allotted, nearly all of it, 344,948.28; leaving a surplus of only 18,630.64 that have not been allotted in that nation.

Only the homesteads of the allottees are reserved from taxation, and these consist of 40 acres each. (Act July 1, 1898, 30 Stat., p. 567.)

There were 2,754 allottees, so that the total number of acres reserved from taxation aggregates 110,160, leaving subject to taxation in this nation:

Acreage farm lands	253,418.92
Wewoka town site (acres)	635.70
Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf Railroad, and St. Louis, Oklahoma and Southern Railroad, miles	25.00

These statistics are taken from the advance sheets of the report of the Dawes Commission for the year ending June 30, 1902.

CREEK NATION.

The total acreage of land in the Creek Nation is 3,172,813.16 acres; reserved for town sites, schools, churches, etc., estimated, 15,000; acres subject to allotment, 3,157,813.16; acres allotted, 2,177,262.44; not allotted, 980,550.72.

Homesteads of 40 acres are reserved from taxation (section 16 of act approved June 30, 1902, and ratified by Creek council July 26, 1902). There are 14,924 allottees entitled to homesteads, making the total acreage exempt from taxation 596,960, and leaving the following property in this nation subject to taxation:

Allotments (acres)	2,560,853.16
25 town sites (acres)	10,546.79
Railroad mileage	400.00

The above statistics are taken from Report of Dawes Commission, 1902.

CHEROKEE NATION.

Total acreage, in the neighborhood of 5,031,351; reserved for town sites, 6,887.65; reserved for schools and churches, 1,000; reserved for railroads, etc., 10,000; total, 18,000; leaving the total amount of acres subject to allotment 5,013,351.

None of this has yet been allotted, but a land office has been established January 1, and the work of allotment is being taken up. There are approximately 35,000 allottees, and under the treaty ratified by the nation August 7, 1902, 40 acres are reserved from taxation for homesteads, making a total of 1,400,000 acres. The following property in this nation after allotment will be subject to taxation:

25 town sites (acres)	6,887.65
Railroads, right of way for railroads (miles)	615

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW NATIONS.

Total acreage (approximate), 11,338,935; reserved from allotment—town sites, 32,843.57; railroads, 20,000; schools, churches, etc., 5,000; coal and asphalt 500,000; total, 558,000; leaving subject to allotment 10,780,935.

Under the act approved July 1, 1902, and subsequently ratified by both these tribes, none of the allotments are exempt from taxation. It therefore appears that the following property in these nations will be subject to taxation as soon as the allotments are completed:

Allotted lands	acres..	10,780,935.00
Ninety-six town sites	do....	32,843.57
Mineral lands to be sold by Interior Department	do....	500,000.00
Railroads in this nation	miles..	1,360.00

Now, summarizing as to what lands are taxable and nontaxable, the statement is as follows:

Lands in the Five Civilized Tribes taxable and nontaxable.

Nation.	Taxable.	Nontaxable.
	Acres.	Acres.
Seminole	253,418.92	110,160
Cherokee	3,631,351.00	1,400,000
Creek	2,560,853.16	596,960
Choctaw and Chickasaw	10,780,935.00	5,000
Total	17,226,558.08	2,112,120

Taking all the five nations in the aggregate, the amount of land that will be taxable as soon as all the allotments are completed will be 17,226,558.08, and only 2,112,120 acres will be nontaxable, and only a small part of that in perpetuity.

In addition to these lands of the reservation, the Quapaw Reservation, in the northeast corner of Indian Territory, is omitted from the foregoing tables. It contains about 25,000 acres and has all been allotted.

As to this reservation I quote the following from Gideon's History of Indian Territory:

A tract of land in the northeast part of the Cherokee Nation is known as the Quapaw Agency. In size it is scarcely larger than a county, but several remnants of tribes who were once powerful reside inside its limits. The Quapaw, Peoria, Miami, Ottawa, Shawnee, Modoc, Wyandotte, and Seneca reservations were all included. The Frisco Railroad passes through the Wyandotte Reservation, and a branch of the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Memphis connects Miami, the capital city, with the main line at Baxter Springs, Kans. Miami, Wyandotte, and Peoria are all incorporate towns, and title can be given to real estate. The Miami Indians can sell 100 acres of their allotments and can make a clear title, the Quapaws can sell inherited allotments, and the Peorias can sell only a certain per cent of their holdings. There is a strip of land 1 mile wide and 2 miles in length in the Wyandotte Reservation in the center of which is the pretty little village of Wyandotte. This is a thriving town, and has an excellent agricultural country around it. The Quapaw Reservation has splendid meadow and grazing lands, with several fine farms in its western part.

Last March Mr. MOON, from the Committee on the Territories of the other House, submitted a report to the House of Representatives (Report No. 956, first session Fifty-seventh Congress) to accompany H. R. 12268, which recommended the creation of Jefferson Territory out of the area now embraced within the borders of the Indian Territory. In that report the committee considered the question of taxable property, and the following extract is taken from that report:

The real estate in the Indian Territory is at present exempt from taxation, the title to the whole body of the lands outside of the towns being yet in the Indians, but the taxable property is sufficient to support a Territorial government. The following data, obtained from reliable sources, give a conservative estimate of some of the property subject to taxation:

Ninety incorporated towns, including only about 75,000 of the population, have an assessed valuation of taxable property of $20,000,000. A conservative estimate of the taxable value of unincorporated towns is $5,000,000. There are 1,500,000 head of cattle, 400,000 head of horses, 65,000 head of mules, about 400,000 hogs, and 25,000 head of sheep. There is invested in coal-mining and coke-oven properties about $4,000,000. There are 1,415 miles of railroad in operation, and about 300 miles now under construction. A conservative estimate of the entire taxable wealth of the Territory could not be less than $60,000,000. No estimate is made of corn, wheat, oats, and cotton, which are also extensively produced in the Territory.

In this statement Mr. MOON has not taken into account, as I have in the statement I have just read, the fact that in two of these tribes, the Creeks and Seminoles, the allotments are practically completed, and that those lands are or will in the immediate future be subject to taxation; and as to the other three nations the Dawes Commission now is engaged in the work of making allotments. They are trying to perfect the roll of citizenship. As soon as those rolls are completed the work of allotment will go on and, I think, inside of a year, or eighteen months at the furthest, that work will be entirely completed.

Using the quotation just read by me in connection with the foregoing statistics, a reasonably conservative estimate of taxable values of the Indian Territory may be reached. In this estimate I take $3 per acre as the average assessable value of the farm lands.

Property subject to taxation as per estimate of House committee	$60,000,000.00
Farm lands in Seminole Nation now allotted and subject to taxation, 253,418.92 acres, at $3	760,255.76
Farm lands in Creek Nation now allotted and subject to taxation, 2,177,262.44, at $3	6,531,787.32
Railroad mileage included in House committee report, 1,415 miles. Mileage now reported by Dawes Commission is 2,400 miles. Excess 1,000 miles, at $7,500 per mile	7,500,000.00
Incorporated towns in House committee report, 91. Now incorporated, 146. Difference, 55 towns	10,000,000.00
Total at present subject to taxation	84,791,043.08

I am taking the value of the personal property, the value of the town sites, the value of the stock and the cattle and everything, and the value in this estimate of the lands that have been allotted to two of the tribes in which the allotments are practically completed.

In addition to the above, as soon as allotments are completed there will be lands subject to taxation as follows:

Creek Nation, 980,550.72 acres, at $3	$2,941,652.16
Cherokee Nation, 5,013,351 acres, at $3	15,040,053.00
Chickasaw and Choctaw nations:
10,780,935 acres, at $3	32,342,805.00
500,000 acres mineral and asphalt lands	25,000,000.00

This last $75,000,000 will be constantly coming in, and will doubtless all be subject to taxation within two or three years from this time.

In other words, there are practically now $84,000,000 worth of property, at a low estimate, subject to taxation. The lands are estimated at only $3 an acre, and they are probably worth from $25 to $50. There are now $84,000,000 worth of property subject to taxation, and in the near future, as soon as these allotments are completed, there will be at least $75,000,000 to $80,000,000 more, and that by only putting the value of the lands on the basis of $3 an acre, and they are among the best agricultural lands in all this country.

I have now gone over the question of taxation of these lands, as to what lands are taxable and what are not taxable. I now take up and refer to the lands that are alienable and nonalienable.

LANDS INALIENABLE AND ALIENABLE, AND WHEN ALIENABLE.

Seminoles, 253,418 acres, alienable when patent issues.

Seminoles, 110,160 acres (40-acre homesteads); inalienable in perpetuity.

Cherokee, 3,631,351 acres, alienable in five years after issue of patent.

Cherokee, 1,400,000 acres (40-acre homesteads); inalienable during life of allottee, not exceeding twenty-one years.

Creek, 2,560,853 acres, not alienable without consent of Secretary of Interior till five years after approval of supplemental treaty (June 30, 1902).

Creek, 596,960 acres (40-acre homesteads); inalienable for twenty-one years after date of deed.

Choctaw and Chickasaw, 5,780,935 acres (160-acre homesteads); inalienable during life of allottee, not exceeding twenty-one years from date of certificates of allotment.

Choctaw and Chickasaw, 5,000,000 acres, alienable—one-fourth in one year, one-fourth in three years, and one-half in five years after issue of patent.

I have here, Mr. President, in this statement attempted to show the exact condition of the land question in that Territory. I have pointed out what progress has been made in the way of allotments and I pointed out the condition of those lands when allotments are completed, as to what lands are alienable and inalienable, and as to what lands are taxable and nontaxable, and the limitations and qualifications in respect to alienation and taxation.

I have pointed out these facts in such detail, Mr. President, for the purpose of showing that there are no serious obstacles to attaching Indian Territory to Oklahoma and making the two into one State. The Indian Territory would be abundantly able to share and bear its just proportion of taxes.

Perhaps, in the first instance, there might not be as many lands taxable in Indian Territory as there are in Oklahoma, and yet I doubt it. The bulk of the lands in Oklahoma are nontaxable until a patent has been issued. Most of them have been entered under the homestead law, and lands that have been entered under the homestead law are not taxable until a final patent is issued. I do not know whether they do in Oklahoma as we have done in Minnesota and in some of the Western States—tax the improvements of the homesteaders. But until a patent is issued, which, except in commutation cases, can not be until after five years, the lands are not taxable. It would be a great labor, but I think if we had a complete list from the Land Office giving a description of every homestead entry made in Oklahoma Territory, if we had a complete list of the homestead entries, their dates, and the facts, showing what entries have been proved up and patented and what not, we should find that the bulk of the land in Oklahoma Territory to-day is not taxable and will not be for some years to come.

I see sitting at my left here the able junior Senator from South Dakota, my near neighbor [Mr. MCCUMBER]. He knows full well the truth of what I speak in this connection, that homestead lands are not taxable before final entry. That should be taken into account, Mr. President.

I may say for those who are not familiar with that law that a homesteader, under existing laws, makes his first or preliminary entry. That is the beginning of it. He can, after settling on the land, cultivating it, and living on it for fourteen months, commute it—that is, furnish proof that he has complied with the law for fourteen months and pay for the land. That gives him a certificate of entry, and in due course a patent is issued. But if he does not choose to pay for the land, he can live on it seven years. He can prove up at the end of five years.

Five years' residence entitles him to a free entry of the land if he proves his residence and cultivation, but he can take two years more. A homesteader who is not anxious to sell his land, in a great many cases avails himself of the two years for proving up, so that he has seven years. If you take into account the fact that a great many of these lands have been recently opened you will see that a large portion of the lands in that Territory are not subject to taxation. I think by the time all the available lands have been entered as homesteads and by the time those entries have been consummated and reduced to ultimate patents of title, the bulk of the land in the Indian Territory will become taxable.

So, when we come to the matter of taxation of real estate, Mr. President, we find that there will be as much real estate taxable in the near future in Indian Territory as in Oklahoma.

The Indian Territory has one class of property that is immediately taxable that Oklahoma has not. I refer to the valuable coal fields. Five hundred thousand acres of those valuable coal lands are to be segregated and immediately available for disposal. There is an asset for taxation that equals thousands of acres of homestead lands.

So, Mr. President, in the matter of taxation, as I said a moment ago, Indian Territory is at this particular instant, and would be as soon as the two Territories are combined, united, and admitted as one State, fully competent and able to bear her full share of the burdens of taxation. There can be no question as to that.

The substitute reported by the committee does not interfere with allotments; it does not interfere with the consummation and perfection of allotments of land in that Territory; it does not interfere with any of the special rights of the Indians. But suppose it did interfere with that provision which says that tribal government shall not cease until 1906, I submit that it would be a blessing to the Indians to obliterate those governments before that time. These tribal governments have been as great a curse as firewater has been to the Indians; those tribal governments, from the very beginning down to the present time, have been a curse and a nightmare to the development of those Indians, and it would be a blessing, now that they are citizens of the United States, to put them on a par with other citizens and give them all the privileges and immunities that other citizens of the United States enjoy.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The convention at Oklahoma City held last week had as its president a full-blood Indian; as its permanent chairman an Indian from the Indian Territory; as its secretary an Indian from the Indian Territory; and Indians from the Indian Territory were among the delegates demanding the very relief which the substitute proposed by the committee affords; demanding and begging this Congress to give them relief from the tribal condition of which the Senator so cogently speaks.

Mr. NELSON. I have no doubt, Mr. President, but that a great and large majority of the members of the Five Civilized Tribes are as anxious for statehood as are the white people in that Territory, because their petty tribal governments have been a curse and a burden to them; they have been simply instruments in the hands of a few schemers among their own people, and oftentimes of white schemers, who are ex officio members of the tribe simply by marriage or adoption.

Mr. President, I am about done. Perhaps I owe an apology to the Senate for taking up so much of its time, but I have endeavored from first to last, in my humble way, in a plain and unvarnished manner, to point out the important facts and circumstances which ought to guide and govern us in a matter of such great moment. At the outset, Mr. President, I briefly pointed out the general principles that ought to control us in the admission of new Territories as States in respect to population, in respect to numbers, in respect to the moral and intellectual qualities of the people, and in respect to their industrial and economic development as States. Then, after laying down those general rules, I proceeded to take up these Territories, one by one.

I first took up the Territory of Arizona. I pointed out in that case, in as brief a manner as I possibly could and do the matter justice, first, that as to population, deducting the Indians not entitled to representation under any circumstances, giving that Territory credit for all that it reasonably can claim at this time, it did not have a population which entitled it to one Representative in the other House of Congress. Taking the figures of the census as a basis and allowing them the same rate of increase they had from 1890 to 1900, they have at this time not much over 106,000 people. If you take the statistics of the Indian Office as to the number of the Indian population, they would have only a little over a hundred thousand. They have only a little more than one-half of the ratio entitling them to a Representative in the other House of Congress.

In the next place, I pointed out the fact—and in respect to Arizona I did not go outside of the statistics of the census—that in the matter of illiteracy the people of Arizona occupy a very low level, a lower level than any of the States of this country except a few of the old slave States which, in the days prior to the civil war, were burdened with a large slave population. I showed the great discrepancy with reference to illiteracy between that Territory and all the great and growing and progressive States of the country. Then I showed that the industrial life of the people was in a stagnant and comatose condition; that only a mere fraction, a mere bagatelle, less than 1 per cent, far less—I do not remember the exact figures—of the area of that Territory has ever been under cultivation; that cultivation is limited by irrigation, and that irrigation has reached its limits.

Cattle raising and agriculture, for the lack of water, for the want of irrigation, for a long time have been at a standstill. Their mining industry, for which so much has been claimed, is exceedingly limited. Aside from that of copper, of which there is some mining, their gold and silver mining is very slight indeed; and as to coal there is almost next to nothing.

Take the Territory as a whole in respect to the number of its people, in respect to their quality and capacity for self-government, in respect to their industrial and economic development, and it seems to me, Mr. President, the Territory of Arizona is at this time wholly unfit for statehood, and that it ought to remain in a Territorial condition for some time to come. It ought to remain in that condition, Mr. President, for another reason; and that is, by recent legislation of Congress we have made provision for a vast scheme of irrigation under the auspices and at the expense of the Federal Government. That law ought to have a chance to operate for the good of those people; that law ought to have time to confer the blessings that are to come to the people of Arizona, as they will come to other portions of the arid belt—like Divine grace, without price.

If we admit those people to statehood at this time, the promoters and the schemers, who have all kinds of schemes of irrigation for the purpose of promoting stock jobbing and disposing of land, will go there; they will run the Territory and the municipalities into debt; whereas if the people are left in a Territorial condition, they can gradually, without any expense, under the blessings of the recent legislation passed by Congress, to which I have already referred, secure that water supply, that irrigation which is so essential to their industrial life and happiness.

I am now only making a brief summary. I next took up the case of New Mexico. In the case of New Mexico, although it is one of the oldest settled portions of the United States, which has been settled for more than three hundred years, yet at this moment, if we deduct the nonrepresentative Indian population, it has barely enough people for one Representative in the other House of Congress.

If there were no objection but the mere matter of numbers I should have nothing to say; but when you come to examine the character of that population you find a population in that Territory more un-American in all its characteristics than you find anywhere else in our borders between the two great oceans. It is to-day, as I said, Mr. President, as it has been in the past, a portion of old Mexico injected into the bowels of the United States. The characteristics which it possessed in its earliest period it still possesses in a great degree, and on account of the climate, the soil, and other things there has not been sufficient immigration of Americans to Americanize that country and make it like the rest of the United States.

Notwithstanding all the advantages of a Territorial government—the same advantages of Territorial government that the other Territories of the Northwest enjoyed—they never had a public school system established in New Mexico prior to 1888, although they became an organized Territory as early as 1851. They did not make as much progress in the matter of public education for the masses of their people from 1851 to 1888, a period of thirty-seven years, as the people of Porto Rico have made within the last two years, since we passed the act organizing and establishing the Territorial government of Porto Rico.

But that is not all, Mr. President. I am not finding fault because those people are of Mexican descent. That is not at all to their discredit. What I am finding fault with them for is that they do not become Americanized, and that they still speak the Spanish language. Two-thirds of the people of that Territory are known as Spanish-Mexicans, and with them the Spanish language is still the predominating language. In their public schools Spanish is taught side by side and on a footing of equality with English, and in many schools back in the country districts they teach nothing but Spanish.

Look at their courts, Mr. President, and you have a spectacle in reference to the administration of justice that you do not find anywhere else under the jurisdiction of our Government outside of Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands. In those courts they have interpreters not only to interpret the testimony of witnesses—for that is common enough and occurs all over the country—but they have interpreters to interpret the arguments of counsel to the jury, to interpret the charge of the court to the jury, and, what is more, in many instances they send interpreters into the grand and petit jury rooms, to be among the jurymen—a thing never heard of anywhere else in all this broad land. I do not think you will find any court outside the courts of New Mexico that would tolerate an interpreter going in among the jurors when they are deliberating on their verdict. The same thing takes place in the legislative halls, where they use the Spanish language fully as much as the English. Their laws are printed in both languages—Spanish and English.

Go to their justices' courts, and you find almost all the justices' courts in that country are wholly conducted in the Spanish language. Their dockets—and everybody who is familiar with jurisprudence knows what a justice's docket is—from beginning to end are in the Spanish language. A man going to that country to examine the dockets of any of those justices' courts and to examine the proceedings, if he came there blindfolded would think that he was in Spain or old Mexico, and not in a portion of the United States that has been a part of our country ever since General Kearney and Colonel Doniphan occupied that country in 1846.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is there no hope for a change?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; there is hope for a change; and I want to give those people an opportunity of a good training school, as good a training school as any of us need—a well-organized Territorial government. The State of the honorable Senator from Oregon was for some time a Territory, and all the great Northwestern States have been in a Territorial condition; but although they occupied that position, they never allowed that to stop the wheels of progress.

I live in a State, Mr. President, where perhaps one-fourth of the population is of foreign birth, and yet I have never known anywhere in that State—and I have practiced law in many counties of the State—such a thing as an interpreter standing up beside a lawyer and interpreting his argument to the jury; I have never known the charge of a judge interpreted to the jury, and I have never known such a thing as an interpreter being sent in with a grand jury or a petit jury to interpret and deliberate with them, except in New Mexico.

Mr. SPOONER. Such a thing would vitiate the verdict of a jury almost anywhere else.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; it would anywhere else except in New Mexico vitiate a verdict, as the Senator from Wisconsin says. To allow a man to go into a jury room when the jury were deliberating, and he not a member of the jury, would be ground for setting aside an indictment in any court except in the courts of New Mexico.

As I was saying, I have never known of such a thing in my portion of the country, and there we have never had the laws published in any but the English language. Our public schools are conducted in the English language even in the districts—and there are many of them—where the bulk of the population were born in foreign countries; and yet they are as loyal and as faithful to the American system of public schools as though they were to the manner born. But how is it in New Mexico? In spite of all the advantages they have had, those people are still Spanish, still un-American, still backward. Those people are not at this time fit and qualified for or entitled to State government.

It is for our interest to be, and it is one of the glories of this county that we are, a homogeneous, Anglo-Saxon nation, speaking the English language. We do not want any other language to usurp and maintain a foothold in this country; we do not want a Spain, or a Germany, or a Norway, or anything else of that kind in this country; we want the whole of it a homogeneous, Anglo-Saxon, English-speaking people; and so long as any portion of our country is in that un-American condition in respect to language and education I submit that it ought to remain in a state of pupilage and as a Territory until it has reached the full manhood of American citizenship.

It is no hardship to the people of New Mexico, as it would be for the people of the Indian Territory, to be deprived of admission into the Union. They have a good government. Congress has given them a large school grant, greater than was given to the Northwestern States. Let them utilize that school grant; let them Americanize themselves; let the proceedings of their courts and their legislature be conducted in English; let them publish their laws only in the English language and have their schools teach nothing but English, except in their higher schools, where they teach a foreign language as one of the dead languages. All these things they can accomplish while in a Territorial condition; and until they have accomplished and availed themselves of these privileges they have not the right to come here and apply for statehood.

In this matter, Mr. President, it is not the clamor of the politicians and the promoters to which we ought to listen, but we ought to listen to the conscience and voice and sober sense of the American people, and not do what those politicians and promoters ask us to do, but do what is best for the highest good and the greatest blessing of the American people.

Now, coming to Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, I am actuated by no hostility to the people of Oklahoma. When they came here some years ago to get the free homestead bill passed, although but few people in my State had an interest in it, and that a limited one, I was anxious to pass that bill for the relief and help of the people of Oklahoma, for it helped more people in that country than anywhere else.

Mr. President [Mr. FRYE in the chair], you will remember I stood up in this Chamber and got the unanimous consent of the Senate to pass the free homestead bill, and no legislation outside of that establishing Territorial governments in Oklahoma has conferred a greater blessing upon the people of that Territory than that act. Their great progress from the time they became a Territory until to-day shows that they have not been in a political strait-jacket. They have not been too tightly laced for their own progress. They have grown and prospered as rapidly as have any of the great and growing Northwestern States. They are not hampered or restrained either by legislation or for want of good administration. They do not suffer for the want of good government. But take their sister Territory right by their side. Look at the conditions there.

Four hundred thousand people of our own kith and kin, as intelligent, as energetic and prosperous, and as good American citizens as there are in any portion of this country, and to-day they are utterly helpless. It is as though their arms and legs were entirely shackled. They have no schools for the children except in a few limited instances, and they have no county, town, or municipal government except in a few town sites. They are utterly helpless. They have come there at the request and on the invitation of the members of the Five Civilized Nations to build up that country, and they have made it a prosperous country—a very garden of Eden; but still they are there as the poor Israelites were in Egypt under the administration of Pharaoh.

Are we to leave them in that condition? No. There is no haste about Arizona; there is no haste about New Mexico; there is no haste even about Oklahoma; but there is haste in regard to the Indian Territory. There is that haste which comes from justice and equity and a purpose to do right: there is haste about doing justice to the people of the Indian Territory and giving them a good government as soon as practicable; and now, Mr. President, is the accepted time. Let us unite these two little Territories, small in area, with a ragged, broken frontier between them, as ragged and broken as though a limb or a bone had been fractured; let us unite those ligaments that were once together, and make them into one State that will compare in area and dignity with the other great States of the Mississippi Valley—with the State of Arkansas, the State of Kansas, the State of Nebraska, the State of South Dakota, and the State of North Dakota, in the very same row of States.

It is to the advantage of those people to be a great State, on a par with the other great States of the Union. And then look at the great mutual advantages which would come of their union. In natural resources one Territory is the complement of the other. Oklahoma is a prairie country, with little or no timber, and no coal. The eastern half of it is a fertile agricultural country; the west half well within the semiarid belt, a grazing and cattle country. East of it is the Indian Territory, with an abundance of water, with over a million acres of good, valuable timber, including pine and hard wood; and with a large quantity of coal for fuel, one of the greatest necessities of life. What one Territory lacks the other has. By uniting these two Territories, you will have a State that will be possessed of all the great resources that are essential to the development of a State. You will have a stock-raising State; you will have an agricultural State; you will have a mining State; you will have a lumbering State; you will have a coal-producing State, all in one.

Then look at the great commercial advantages. Every Senator knows what the crossing of State lines means, not only in the matter of arresting and capturing criminals, but also in the matter of traffic and transportation. Under our dual system of government State regulation and State control in reference to railroad and other transportation is limited to the traffic and commerce beginning and ending in a single State. If it extends beyond the limits of that State it is subject to interstate law, subject to Federal power. If the two Territories separate, the conveyance of coal by rail from the Choctaw Nation into Oklahoma would come under the interstate or Federal law. If you have these two combined, coal will be carried from the realms of the Choctaw Nation to the people of Oklahoma under one political head, under one legislative and judicial system, which will enable those people to protect themselves against monopoly in mining and transportation, and what that means we know full well by our experiences in the recent great coal strike.

For the good of the people of both Territories, on account of their natural resources, I say they ought to be one, and that it would be an act of cruelty to separate them—separate what you might say that God hath joined together—separate them and cast them adrift, isolated from each other, commercially and industrially.

As I have shown, there is no hardship to the people of Oklahoma in being united with the Indian Territory. If you take into account all the lands that have been entered under the homestead law in Oklahoma Territory, there are about as many lands—or there will be within the next year—subject to taxation in the Indian Territory as there are in Oklahoma. If you take into account also the numerous town sites that have been settled by those 400,000 white men, the very valuable coal and asphalt fields that are now being developed on such an extensive scale—take all these into account and there is no doubt at all about the people of the Indian Territory being competent and able to bear the full burdens of taxation.

It is not fair, as I said yesterday, for the people of Oklahoma to say, "Let us in now, and then put in a clause providing that we can afterwards take in the Indian Territory." The people of the Indian Territory, if they are to be a part of the combined State, ought to be admitted at the same time, in order that they may all participate in the constitutional convention and have a voice as to the fundamental principles of government. Why should not the 400,000 white people of the Indian Territory have the right to participate in a constitutional convention and express their views as to the constitutional government as well as the people of Oklahoma? Why should we compel them to accept a ready-made government and let them in afterwards, as it were, by grace?

I submit, Mr. President, that as a matter of fairness and as a matter of justice, if we are ever going to combine the two into one, let us combine them now, at the time when we admit them into the Union. By doing so the people of the two Territories—and I want to say that in the committee's substitute in the matter of delegates to the constitutional convention we put them on a footing of equality—if we admit them now and allow them jointly to come in, the people of the Indian Territory will have the same voice and the same opportunity as those of Oklahoma to express their views on the formation of a constitution and a State government, as they ought to have, and any other method of joining them together would be unjust in the extreme to the people of Indian Territory.

Mr. President, I have not occupied the attention of the Senate just for the mere love of debate; I have not occupied it for the purpose of filibustering; I have occupied it, in my humble way, to present all the facts bearing upon the question fully and fairly to the Senate of the United States. I have attacked nobody; I have abused nobody; I have simply aimed, from history, from statistics, and from the evidence, to lay the facts before the Senate in order that every Senator may judge of them as I judge of them. I have no doubt but that every Senator is actuated by the same spirit by which I am actuated, and that is to do what is best for our great country. I am actuated by no hostility to the people of Arizona or New Mexico as such; but while I love them, I love the United States of America more, and what is for the good of our great country, the united whole, is uppermost in my heart and affection.

The Secretary read as follows:

PURCELL, IND. T., December 28, 1902.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Outside of a few officeholders and politicians the fight you are making for single statehood is unanimously approved of by all the representative people of both Territories, including the best Indian citizens.

We not only believe you are fighting for what you believe to be right, but that you are demanding that justice be done 400,000 representative American citizens who have even been denied the educational facilities extended to the half-civilized Filipinos.

Wishing you success, I am, respectfully, J. M. BRONAUGH.

PURCELL, IND. T., December 27, 1902.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I for one (and I think I voice the sentiment of 90 per cent of the people of Oklahoma and Indian Territory) sincerely desire that the Nelson bill admitting Oklahoma and Indian Territory as one State be passed immediately and allow us people a future for our children in way of educational features, not mentioning other benefits which are apparent.

Respectfully,

J. W. HUDSON.

[From the Shawnee Herald.]

SINGLE STATEHOOD ON TOP.

The Herald has frequently called attention to the anomalous political conditions that hedged about the statehood condition. During the last campaign much capital was made by the McGuire supporters out of the fact that the Democratic platform was not in line with the Democratic members of Congress and the Senate, who were known to be solidly supporting the omnibus bill. On the other hand, the Herald frequently pointed out that the Republican platform in this Territory was wholly at variance with the undoubted attitude of the Republican Senators in whose hands the fate of statehood lay. The action of the Senate committee yesterday in knocking out the omnibus bill and substituting therefor a sensible, rational, out-and-out single statehood bill is a thorough vindication of the Democratic platform in the late election, and puts those Republicans who voted for Bill Cross and single statehood in the front rank of their party in the Territory. No greater rebuke has ever been administered to the traitors, cowards, and peanut politicians who waged the warfare for an emasculated State of Oklahoma alone and statehood for the greasers and nondescripts of Arizona and New Mexico, while defaming the half million splendid Americans who are our neighbors in the Indian Territory.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., December 4, 1902.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON, M. C.,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Pardon me for referring to our former acquaintance, dating back to 1888, 1889, and 1893; first, during legislation for the opening of Oklahoma to homestead settlement, and later at the antitrust convention at Music Hall, Chicago. In reference to single statehood, I saw by the dailies on yesterday that you, chairman of the Senate Territorial Committee, reported a substitute bill for the Flynn bill; that your bill provides for creating a State out of or combining the Oklahoma and Indian Territories in one State. In this you are right, and nothing short of erecting one grand, imposing, magnificent State out of these two Territories should be attempted by the United States Congress.

Were single statehood submitted to a nonpartisan vote, I think I do not overestimate the result when saying that 80 per cent of the people of both Territories would be cast for just such a measure—the bill you now advocate—as the commercial and political, and, I may add, social interests are so thoroughly cemented together that it would not be short of criminal neglect on the part of Congress to create two States where but one should be established for the good of all concerned. Give to our people one State and you will have added to the satellites of this great and grand Union of States a commonwealth second to no State in our grand galaxy of States, all things considered, associated with intellect, wealth, patriotism, and greatness. And we, the old pioneers who fought her early battles and spent the best years of our lives struggling on and on for homestead settlement, never entertained the faintest opinion that else than one grand State would some day favor the citizens and inhabitants of these twin Territories. Trusting in your ability as one of our leading, broad-gauged statesmen, we now flatter ourselves with foreseen success at your hands. Thanking you for the manly stand you have taken in the interest of all concerned, I will close by wishing you success.

Very respectfully, yours,

SAML. CROCKER.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT REPUBLICAN CLUB, NO. 1.
Sapulpa, Ind. Ter., December 4, 1902.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The above heading will tell you what my political belief is, and the people here unanimously, except the carpetbagger gang who have been imported here to hold office, approve the bill reported by the committee, of which you are one, for the admission of this Territory with Oklahoma into one State, and sincerely hope it will soon become a law.

Very truly, J. J. JONES.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., December 5, 1902.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
United States Senator from Minnesota, Washington. D. C.

DEAR SIR: I desire to congratulate you on the noble, statesmanlike, and patriotic stand you have taken regarding statehood for Oklahoma and the Indian Territory. Like yourself, I am a Republican, but I believe there are times when we should rise above partisan politics and do those things that are best for all the people and for the whole nation. The creation of a State out of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory may possibly be a temporary advantage to the Democratic party. The great State of Iowa was once Democratic, and now it is represented by the sturdy ALLISON and the brilliant DOLLIVER. Indiana was once Democratic and now is represented by two brilliant and brainy Republicans, and there was a time in the history of this nation when your own State was not considered as rock-ribbed in Republicanism. Make us one strong, wealthy, conservative State, so that in case the hot winds should blow in a few months' time we would not relapse into a region of desolation and starvation. A strong State means conservatism.

I again congratulate you on the stand which you have taken.

Very truly, yours,

D. C. LEWIS.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., December 11, 1902.

United States Senator BEVERIDGE, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am proud to see that you are so ably leading the fight for the Nelson bill and against the omnibus bill now pending. I live in El Reno where a majority favor single statehood, but where some active politicians for selfish reasons want to defeat that measure. There are no grounds for this opposition except purely selfish ones. Guthrie, the present capital of this Territory, is afraid of her life, that she will lose the capital, while El Reno has some small hopes of securing it if Oklahoma can be made a State now, but the great host of the people of both the Indian and Oklahoma Territories care for nothing just now but one great and grand State made up of the two Territories combined.

I have traveled commercially the two Territories for nine years, know the resources of both, and the combined resources of the two are absolutely necessary to make a prosperous State. I have always supported Dennis Flynn up to this campaign, and told him plainly, some time since, that I no longer could do so. Now, to encourage you, I say use every power at your command, call for expression and support from the two Territories, bring to bear every known or unknown tactics, and defeat this selfish measure, that if successful, would forever divide the two Territories and thus defeat what God and common sense intends shall be—one grand and glorious State, a State that will be an honor and a pride to the Union and also to its citizens.

Make this the fight of your life, dear Senator, and its success will make you the most honored of all men by the people of the two Territories.

Yours, truly,

C. N. WHEELER,
Elreno, Okla.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., December 12, 1902.

Hon. ALBERT BEVERIDGE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Having had one year's residence in Oklahoma, I have had an opportunity to study some of the wants and needs of her people, and I am thoroughly convinced that at least 90 per cent of all the thinking people are unequivocally for single statehood (Oklahoma and Indian Territory as one); that those opposing this measure very largely represent selfish interests.

I further believe that the leading business men care so little for the permanent location of the capital that this city will never enter into a scrimmage to secure same.

The people here are with you in this contest, and I beg to add my humble indorsement.

Very truly, yours, R. R. FULLER.

INDIAN TERRITORY BANKERS' ASSOCIATION,
PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,
Purcell, Ind. T., December 12, 1902.

Hon. A. J. BEVERIDGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please accept these few lines on the statehood question. In that vast tract of land lying between the Mississippi River and the Rocky Mountains there is a line running from the Gulf of Mexico to the northern boundary of the United States which divides the good land from the bad, the fertile from the arid. That line runs about along the ninety-eighth meridian and passes through the center of Texas, through the eastern part of Oklahoma, through the central part of Kansas and Nebraska, and through the eastern part of the Dakotas. West of that line the land is arid, and east of it lies the fertile land. We find the States of Iowa, Missouri, eastern Kansas, eastern Nebraska, the eastern part of the Dakotas, eastern Texas, and the entire Indian Territory east of that line. West of it we find the desert land of Texas, the barren lands of Kansas and Nebraska and the Dakotas and fully three-fourths of Oklahoma.

The eastern half of that tier of States is better than the western half in every instance, and in the eastern half will be found the bulk of the population, the bulk of the wealth, the educational institutions, the commercial supremacy, the seat of political power, and the larger and more important cities. The same will be true of the State made out of Oklahoma and Indian Territory, and it would certainly be unfair and unjust to give Oklahoma statehood now and later on attach the Indian Territory with its greater population, greater wealth, etc., after Oklahoma had made the laws to suit herself and had appropriated all of the State institutions to her part of the State.

At present a large majority of the people of the Indian Territory favor one State, but the instant you give statehood to Oklahoma alone, that instant every man, woman, and child in the Indian Territory will favor making another State of the Indian Territory, and you could not blame them.

Please tell Senator QUAY that the people of the Indian Territory will pay their part of the State taxes and that they will also take care of their municipal and county taxes. Before the tribal governments are extinguished and almost by the time a State government could be established, if your bill passes now, the United States Government will literally dump into the Indian Territory about $50,000,000 in actual cash or United States Treasury checks. That is the money the Indians will receive from the sale of town lots and coal and other mineral lands, and the money now standing to the credit of the Five Civilized Tribes on the books of the United States Treasurer.

This $50,000,000 added to the immense personal property wealth of the Indian Territory would exceed the entire taxable property of Oklahoma. So you see we of the Indian Territory would be perfectly able to pay our part of the taxes.

It may surprise you to know that the Indian Territory has more national banks than a dozen or more of the old Eastern and Southern States.

Indian Territory has more banks than Arizona and New Mexico combined; in fact, has twice as many as those two Territories.

The Indian Territory has almost twice as much banking capital as Arizona and New Mexico combined, and she has very near twice as much in bank deposits as Arizona and New Mexico combined.

I know your time forbids, or I would like to give you more information in my way.

The friends of single statehood of the two Territories are willing to submit the single statehood question to a vote of the people of Oklahoma and Indian Territory.

With sincere hope that your bill will pass, and with personal thanks for the great effort you are making for right and reason, I beg to remain,

Respectfully,

W. M. TOMLIN.

KAW CITY, OKLA., December 24, 1902.

Hon. ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I regretted that I did not have a further opportunity to discuss Oklahoma matters with you while you were here, but my views were outlined in my report to the Secretary of the Interior about a year ago, which I assume you have probably read. Matters in reference to statehood and the Indian Territory are found on the last pages of that report.

I have had little question in my mind about what you and your committee would recommend in the premises; that is to say, so far as the general features of your recommendation are concerned. I believe that the conditions existing in Oklahoma and the Indian Territory suggest but one course when those conditions are understood, and that is that the two Territories be united in one State. I have been surprised that the omnibus statehood bill has received as much consideration as it has.

I have always believed that when Congress should come to seriously consider Oklahoma's admission to statehood they would find so many important questions peculiar to our condition that no law favoring statehood would be hastily passed, but that ample time for the fullest consideration of the whole question would be allowed.

In my report to the Secretary of the Interior, a little over a year ago, made when I was governor of the Territory, I called attention to some of the conditions existing in the Indian Territory, assuming that Congress would deem it wise to defer statehood until these conditions had been rectified and that Territory prepared for statehood with Oklahoma. The suggestions I then made are as pertinent as ever, except where they may have been or may be modified to meet legislation enacted since they were made.

The people of Oklahoma feel they are entitled to statehood, and our social and political conditions are known to be such as to recommend us to Congress. Our geographical area I have always considered an insurmountable barrier.

I presume it would be impossible for Congress to frame a bill, now or at any future session, satisfactory to the people of both Territories. Many western Oklahoma people oppose statehood in union with the Indian Territory. Their opposition has a selfish basis as they consider that in case of such a union their chances for public institutions and offices would be thereby lessened. Some of the people in the Indian Territory object to union from similar motives.

But there is one objection urged by some Oklahoma people against single statehood which has some real merit, and that is that in the Indian Territory sections 16 and 36 have not been set aside for school purposes, and that we are asked to take in that Territory stripped of that endowment. I think this is one of the most important questions with which Congress has to deal, and it should be met in a practical, businesslike way, and that these sections should yet be set aside by Congress for common-school maintenance, and where they are occupied by Indians as homesteads other lands should be given the holders, the Indians being paid for them by Congress at an appraised value as a basis for allotments.

The lawyer who only gives a technical opinion will no doubt say that this would conflict with treaty stipulatons, and that it can not be done, but I believe that these are matters of such grave importance this should be done, and that Congress can and will find a way to do it without violating the rights of the Indians in any manner.

Oklahoma was originally opened under an amendment tacked on to the Indian appropriation bill in the House, which was incomplete, and as a result our people came in and took possession of the land and lived on it without any civil government for more than a year. The Cherokee Outlet was opened for settlement in the same way, after bills had been reported by the committee and discussed on the floor and failed to pass, the general features of which were afterwards tacked on to the appropriation bill as an amendment in the closing hours of the session.

But the fact that this important legislation was passed in this manner, however, has not prevented Oklahoma from making unparalleled progress and demonstrating the error of judgment expressed by members of Congress who opposed the opening for the reason that Indian titles were not extinguished, and that the conditions were not yet ready to allow the country to be thrown open to settlement.

I think that the conditions in the Indian Territory which are urged as objections to statehood can be corrected under statehood better than under any other conditions, but the longer the present conditions are allowed to exist the more difficult it will be to recover from their influences. The Indian Territory at this time is not organized into municipalities and is not prepared to participate in a constitutional convention. I do not think it would be inconsistent to admit Oklahoma as a State comprising the exterior boundaries of the old Indian Territory, and authorizing the organized counties and precincts to send delegates to a constitutional convention. Many people living in the reservations of the Five Tribes would be unable to participate in this convention. This would be the case with several thousand white residents in the Osage, Ponca, and Otoe reservations in Oklahoma as well.

I believe that if Congress pass an enabling act authorizing the organized counties to meet and prepare a constitution, report it to Congress and make provision for the dedication of sections 16 and 36 in the Indian Territory to school purposes, that by the time the constitution is prepared and ready to be reported to Congress there will be very little dissatisfaction or objection in either Territory.

Very truly, yours, WM. M. JENKINS.

WAGONER, IND. T., January 3, 1903.

Senator KNUTE NELSON, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I herewith hand you a copy of resolutions adopted by our citizens to-night in mass convention. You have the people of Indian Territory almost solidly with you in your effort to pass the substitute statehood bill which you introduced in the Senate. If this Congress gives Oklahoma and Indian Territory statehood it is my opinion that it will be a Republican State for several years at least.

The convention that passed these resolutions elected delegates to attend the single statehood convention of the twin Territories to meet in Oklahoma City, Tuesday, January 6, of which you will hear more.

On behalf of our city and the people of Indian Territory, I most heartily thank you for your fight for us.

Sincerely, yours, C. E. CASTLE.

Single statehood resolutions adopted by citizens of Wagoner January 3, 1903.

Whereas Oklahoma and Indian Territory combined have the wealth, the area, and the population to entitle their people to the benefits of statehood, they excelling in the first and last named qualifications any Territory heretofore seeking admission as a State in the American Union;

Whereas the natural resources of the two, the "twin Territories," are allied and supplementary to each other, and are abundantly sufficient to support now and forever a Commonwealth of first rank in the sisterhood of States;

Whereas the immediate admission of the twin Territories as a single State is provided in the substitute statehood bill now pending in the United States Senate, said bill appearing to us to be just and fair to the people of both Territories in that it provides for their admission together on absolute equality with each other and that at once: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the people of Wagoner, Ind. T., in mass convention assembled, do hereby indorse said single statehood bill, and in hope of relief recommend its early passage by Congress.

Be it further resolved, That it is the sense of this mass-meeting of citizens that the public and private interests of the people of Indian Territory will be best subserved by our immediate union with Oklahoma in State or Territorial government.

Resolved further, That we most heartily thank Senators Beveridge, Nelson, and all others who are supporting said bill for the relief of the half million American citizens of Indian Territory, who, in all respects, are capable of self-government, for which we most earnestly pray in union with Oklahoma.

Respectfully submitted.

H. F. JONES,
Chairman Committee on Resolutions.
FRED PARKINSON,
Chairman of Convention.
C. E. CASTLE,
Secretary.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, there came to consult me a short time before the holiday recess a prominent gentleman of the Indian Territory, a clergyman, the Rev. A. Grant Evans, president of the Henry Kendall College, of Muscogee, Ind. T., and moderator of the Synod of the Indian Territory, which includes all the churches of the Presbyterian Church in Oklahoma and Indian Territory. He went to the Indian Territory first in 1884 and was engaged in educational work until 1889, and he has been president of the Henry Kendall College since 1898. He came to consult me in reference to uniting Oklahoma and Indian Territory in one State. He is very much in favor of it. He gave me valuable facts. I asked him to reduce them to writing, which he kindly did, and I ask to have the same read as a part of my remarks.

The Secretary read as follows:

AREA AND POPULATION OF OKLAHOMA AND INDIAN TERRITORY.

The Indian Territory contains 19,776,286 acres, or about 31,000 square miles. The Territory of Oklahoma contains 39,000 square miles, so that the State made by the union of these two Territories would contain, in round numbers, 70,000 square miles. This would make it about equal in area to either Missouri or North Dakota. In size it would be the fifteenth State of the Union, and would be as large as the whole of New England, with the State of New Jersey added. It would have a much smaller proportion of arid and otherwise unproductive land than the majority of the great States of the West, so that in area of lands capable of being made immediately productive it would rank much higher than fifteenth in the list of States. It has an almost ideal diversification of surface and an unsurpassed climate. While the agricultural wealth of Oklahoma is immense, it is deficient in mineral resources. The Indian Territory not only well supplies this deficiency with its vast coal fields, but is also very rich agriculturally, besides having considerable wealth in timber. The climatic conditions are such that the characteristic crops of the North and the South can both be raised advantageously.

With reference to the mineral wealth of the Indian Territory, according to the report of the Indian agent for the Five Civilized Tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, there were produced in that year approximately 2,800,000 tons of coal. The development of the coal fields has only begun. About 500,000 acres are being segregated as coal lands, and will not be allotted, but sold for the benefit of the tribes. The Government surveyors estimate that there are not less than 1,000,000,000 feet of soft lumber, principally Norway pine, and there is much very valuable hard wood timber. The agent also reports for the year ending June 30, 1902, the following agricultural products for the Indian Territory alone:

Wheat, corn, and oats	bushels..	4,500,000
Vegetables	do....	4,000,000
Cotton	bales..	60,000
Hay	tons..	75,000

The climate and soil are admirably adapted to fruit culture, and this will undoubtedly be a considerable source of wealth in the future. Raising quantities of raw materials and having vast supplies of fuel, there would seem to be every probability that the State thus formed would take advantage of its advantageous location, within easy reach of the Gulf ports, to develop considerable manufacturing importance. It has every natural advantage for this. The population of the two Territories, according to the census of 1900, is as follows: Oklahoma, 398,000, and Indian Territory, 392,000, making a total of 790,000. It is claimed on all hands that there has been an unprecedented increase in population in both Territories during the past two years.

A very conservative estimate of population of the two Territories is 1,000,000. If, combined, they come in as a State with this population, the new member of the Union would be more than twice as great in population as any State of the Union was at the time of its admission. It would rank as to population not lower than twenty-eighth, which is to say that only three-fifths of the States are at present larger than this new State would be. According to the census for 1900 the new State would also be very remarkable for the proportion of native-born Americans in it. Of the population of the Indian Territory in 1900, 98.76 per cent are reported as native Americans and only 1.24 per cent foreign born. Almost as remarkable a showing is made in Oklahoma; so that the two Territories united would make a thoroughly American State, fairly up to the average of the great Western States in area, with an ample population, and with such resources as would insure its taking very high rank among the States of the Union.

During the past year nine different lines of railroad have been under construction, and about 400 miles of new roads have been completed and put in operation.

THE POPULATION OF THE INDIAN TERRITORY WITH REFERENCE TO THE FITNESS OF THE PEOPLE FOR STATEHOOD.

Taking the figures of the last Census, with such particulars as to exact number of Indian citizens as may be gathered from the reports of the Dawes' Commission and the Indian Inspector, we find that of the 392,060 population about 85,000 are Indian citizens. This includes the freedmen who were given the privileges of citizenship by the treaties of 1866. Analyzing the figures a little more closely, we find the whole population made up as follows:

	Per cent.
Whites	76
Indians	16.77
Negro citizens	4.78
Other negroes	2.45
Total	100

It will thus be seen that over three-fourths of the entire population are white people, only a very insignificant proportion of whom are foreign born.

While the proportion of illiterates in the Indian Territory is unfortunately rather large, it is smaller than that of some of the States in proximity with it, and this condition is directly traceable to the anomalous conditions existing at present, and makes the strongest kind of argument for statehood, which would give these people the power, which they have been praying for, of establishing a public school system.

It has been stated that the large number of crimes reported in the Indian Territory indicate the unfitness of its people for statehood. In that connection it should be borne in mind that the Federal courts have to place upon their dockets and report a very large number of minor offenses which under any organized government would be disposed of in the lower courts. It should also be remembered that a very large number of the cases reported are of a crime peculiar to the Indian Territory, known as "introducing" or more fully "introducing intoxicating liquors." Deducting these from the whole number reported would make the showing for the Indian Territory not a bad one as compared with the States of the Union.

As far, however, as the charge that the Indian Territory has an exceptionally large proportion of criminals can be substantiated, the claim for statehood for these people is made stronger rather than weakened. A very large proportion of the criminals are very young men, and nothing is more largely responsible for the number of this class of criminals than the want of educational facilities, which the people are pleading for some means of remedying. But the highest proof of the law-abiding character of the overwhelming majority of the white people in the Indian Territory is found in the fact that they have borne themselves so patiently for so long a period under almost intolerable conditions. There is a tendency in some quarters to class all these people as tresspassers or intruders upon the lands of the Indians. There has always been a way for the Indian tribal governments, with the aid of Federal officials, to rid the Territory of real intruders, and, as a matter of fact, only a very few of the white people of the Indian Territory can with any propriety be said to belong to this class. As a rule they have come at the invitation of the Indians and in compliance with their laws to rent farms from them or to engage in business or practice some profession or occupation among them, always paying a tribal tax or license for the privilege of doing so.

The marvelously rich heritage which is being divided among the Indians to-day would have been utterly undeveloped and of comparatively small value had it not been for this class of people. So far from being regarded as trespassers, they are surely entitled to special consideration in the settlement of the future status of the country which they, under so many disadvantages, have brought to its present advanced state of development. For the land they have used they have paid to the individual Indian citizens good rent; as laborers they have rendered him valuable services; and in their professions they have been of unspeakable benefit to him. For him they have made an unexplored wilderness blossom into a land of abounding riches. Socially, their influence upon the Indians has been such that these tribes have become justly entitled to the proud distinction of being known as the Five Civilized Tribes. In addition to all this, these white people have contributed vast sums to the treasuries of the Indian tribes. For example, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, the following sums were collected from these people by the Government officials and placed to the credit of the Indian tribal governments:

Merchandise and occupation tax	$11,967.20
Coal and asphalt royalties	255,462.13
Timber, stone, and gravel royalties	85,213.89
Hay royalty	7,422.31
Cattle and pasture tax	6,248.00
Total	356,313.53

Thus in actual taxes in the last fiscal year, ending June 30, 1902, these people have paid to the Indian governments the sum of $356,313.53. Not one cent of this amount is to be used for making roads, for providing schools for white children, or in any other way for the amelioration of the condition of the white people. The merchandise and occupation tax has been especially galling, but the white man has submitted to this taxation with the utmost patience. For years the laborers in the mines had to pay a monthly tax for the privilege of being allowed to do manual labor. Surely it says much for the law-abiding character of this people that they have submitted so patiently to this taxation, not only without representation, but also without any expectation that any part of the taxes paid will be used in any way to ameliorate their condition.

There can be no question that without the labor and enterprise of the white man not one of the coal mines in the Indian Territory, which in the past four years have paid $700,000 into the Indian treasuries, would have been opened. The half a million acres of coal lands which are to be sold for the benefit of the Indians and which will add a magnificent sum to the value of their estate would have been unexplored, and would have brought very little to them. But it is not only in values returned to individuals and in the payment of taxes that the white man has been benefiting the Indian. Nearly 200 towns have been surveyed and platted. The lots in these have been appraised and the occupiers of these lots are paying the Indian tribal governments for them. The work of appraisement is not yet completed and the report of the Indian inspector for the year ending June 30, 1902, only gives the figures for some of the towns in the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Creek nations.

The appraised valuation for the towns where the work is complete is $2,207,423. When the appraisement is completed it will show an immense sum of money to be paid by the residents of the towns, who are nearly all white people, into the Indian treasuries. During the past year the Indian inspector reports having collected and placed to the credit of the Indian tribal governments for town lots the sum of $237,725.39. It is undoubtedly the white man's presence and enterprise that has given any substantial value to the lots in these towns, so that he is now paying to the Indian largely for the values which he himself has created. From the above figures it will be seen that in addition to what has been paid in rent and in other ways to the individual Indian citizens, the white men have contributed to the Indian treasuries during the last fiscal year in taxes and for town lots a total of about $300,000.

Thus, so far from being a lawless class of trespassers on the domain of the Indians, these people have certainly placed not only the Indians, but the whole nation, under some obligation to render them fair and equitable treatment. More in number than the entire population of Arizona and New Mexico, essentially American, manifesting a determined spirit of enterprise in the face of tremendous discouragements, law-abiding under circumstances calculated to try the patience of the best citizens, these people, gathered from every State in the Union and representing much of the most vigorous manhood and enterprise of all, have shown themselves to be preeminently the material of which great States have been built in the past, and which can be trusted to make great States to-day.

DANGER OF THE CONTINUANCE OF PRESENT ANOMALOUS CONDITIONS.

According to the last census there were 392,000 people in the Indian Territory, nearly 300,000 of whom are white American citizens. The development in the last two years has been tremendous, so that there are probably at least 400,000 people in the Indian Territory to-day who are not citizens of any of the Indian tribes. The omnibus bill leaves these people without any immediate relief and with a prospect suggested of being ultimately absorbed piecemeal into a State now to be created, which has a population about equal to that of the Indian Territory, and which has not as great natural resources. It leaves the 400,000 people without any means for providing themselves with such essentials of American civilization as the public-school system. Being utterly unorganized, except as regards a judicial system, there is no way in which they are allowed to make public roads, to establish asylums for the insane and other helpless classes, and, above all, to establish schools for the education of their children.

Government officials estimate that there are at present in the Indian Territory 100,000 children of school age. A study of the provision made for these is fearfully suggestive. Under the Curtis Act and subsequent treaties with the Indian governments it was made possible for incorporated towns in the Indian Territory to tax themselves for the support of public schools. The report of the Government superintendent of schools for the year ending June 30, 1902, shows that 16 towns have taken advantage of this privilege. Various missionary boards have schools which have been doing excellent work, to which both white people and Indians are admitted. Each of the Indian tribes has its school system now under the oversight of Government officials. To some of the Indian day schools white children are admitted upon payment of a stipulated fee. A good many are shown to have attended, but a close examination of the reports shows that in the great majority of cases the attendance has been for so short a period that not much advantage could have been reaped.

The following table shows the entire educational provision as reported by the superintendent of schools for the year ending June 30, 1902:

	Whites.	Indians.	Negroes.	Total.
Private and mission schools	1,158	540	----------	1,698
Public schools	6,541	748	968	8,257
Indian schools	6,692	10,702	1,957	19,351
Total	14,391	11,990	2,925	29,306

The above figures give the total enrollment, which in a great number of cases is only for a very few weeks of the year. It is thus seen that out of an entire school population of 100,000 less than 30,000 have been enrolled in any kind of school, and for the remaining 70,000 no provision whatever is made, and there is at present no legal way of making it. A very serious aspect of this is the fact that under existing conditions the more intelligent class of people who are anxious to lease or rent Indian lands and make their homes in the Territory are discouraged from coming. The best settlers will not go where they can not get school advantages for their children. Thus the country is in danger of being left more and more for the illiterate, ignorant, and shiftless class of settlers. It seems a cruel mockery under these conditions to taunt these people with their illiteracy. The marvel is, under the circumstances, that the percentage is so low.

In the rural districts may be met the Indian children and the children of negro citizens of the tribes coming home from their schools, but for the white American citizens there is no school at all. A not uncommon incident in the towns is the visit of some sturdy and intelligent white farmer, who has to stoop to go round, hat in hand, begging the merchants and others for a contribution to help the white people in his neighborhood get a small building in which they can attempt to carry on a subscription school. Present conditions are such as to altogether discourage this class of citizens and drive them away, leaving the country for those who care for none of these things. If relief is not given, and that speedily, there is great danger that the problem in the Indian Territory may change from its present form of "How may the people be supplied with the schools for which they are begging?" to the far more difficult one of "How can the people be interested in schools and made willing to have them?"

THE EFFECT OF STATEHOOD ON THE INDIAN.

Tere is a vigorous claim made in some quarters that there should be no change in conditions in the Indian Territory until the final extinction of the Indian tribal governments on March 4, 1906, and that under old treaties the Indians should be given the first voice in deciding as to their future status. This claim can hardly be put forth seriously by those who are advocating an arrangement by which the Indian Territory may be absorbed piecemeal into another State in the making of the constitution and the founding of the institutions of which it has had no voice. When the Indian becomes a citizen of the United States, as he is to-day, he can claim no more than influence in direct proportion to his numbers. Surely it is not unprecedented or impracticable that in the organization of a State the new government should be bound to make no arrangements which would in any way interfere with the pledges given by the Federal Government. In any legitimate change of government the fulfillment of such pledges must always be considered essential.

A very small proportion of the Indian citizens need or expect any different treatment from that given white people. In many cases there is far more white than Indian blood in their viens. Only a very small minority speak the Indian languages and are unable to speak English. These are the full-bloods to whom every consideration of justice and humanity demands that we should accord the tenderest and most generous treatment. For them more than for any class it is imperative that there should be immediate relief from present conditions. In three years the Indian will have no longer the protection of the tribal or the Federal Government. He will have to stand or fall for himself. The worst and most cruel thing we can do for him is to maintain such conditions as will inevitably surround him with white neighbors and negroes belonging to the most shiftless, ignorant, and degraded classes, and the best thing we can do for him is to make such conditions that his neighbors will belong to the opposite classes, and his children be given the opportunity of learning the English language and American citizenship, where it can be most effectively taught, in the common school.

It is hard, almost impossible, to get any general or reliable expression of their desires from these people. There are plenty of white Indians who have become wealthy under existing conditions and are not anxious for a change, but for the masses of the poorer Indians, especially the full-bloods, no voice is competent to speak. Wisdom and justice can alone be our guide in deciding as to their destiny. Could anything more just be offered than that he should be given the right to his fair proportionate share of representation in the organizing of a great State in the Territory which was not so very long ago occupied entirely by Indian tribes, with the right of full citizenship in it? And could anything be more mercifully wise, in his behalf, than that steps should be taken without delay to enable that part of the State in which he has had and will have his home to be the abode of thrifty and intelligent citizens? The Indian citizens have carried on for over half a century governments republican in form; they are familiar with republican institutions. For whites and Indians alike it may be said that never has a State been admitted to this great Union whose citizens were better prepared for the duties and responsibilities involved in such admission than the people of this great Territory are now.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, with the permission——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT of Connecticut in the chair). The Senator from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. At this point of the Senator's very able speech, I desire, with his permission, to send to the desk and have read the following telegrams respecting the committee's substitute bill, expressing the opinion of the people affected as to this bill on the one hand and the omnibus bill on the other hand. I ask, with the permission of the Senator from Minnesota, that the telegrams be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the reading of the telegrams? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., December 14, 1902.

Hon. ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE,

D. C. LEWIS, Chairman.
W. M. HENRY, Secretary.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I call attention to the fact that from Oklahoma itself comes in this telegram, not only an advocacy of the committee's substitute, but a protest against the proposition of the omnibus bill to admit Oklahoma as a State by itself. This confirms the opinion of the subcommittee that a very large and respectable number of weighty citizens of Oklahoma prefer their present Territorial condition, which is one of exceeding prosperity, unsurpassed by any section of the country, to what they conceive and what the committee conceives to be the great mistake of admitting it as a single Commonwealth. I think it worthy of note and that the attention of the Senate should be called to the fact that from Oklahoma itself comes in this telegram and others not only an indorsement of the committee's substitute, but a positive protest against the proposition contained in the so-called omnibus bill.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading, as follows:

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., December 14, 1902.

Senator A. J. BEVERIDGE, Washington, D. C.:

I heartily indorse your bill for single statehood of two Territories. Believe it to be best for all classes in Indian Territory.

WM. T. HUTCHINGS.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the Claremore convention, referred to in the telegram which was read before the last one, was a convention held during the summer, I think, at Claremore, Ind. T., very largely represented, and, as I am informed, although I speak now only from recollection and on information, it contained representatives not only from the white citizens of Indian Territory, but also from the Indian nations.

There is another point with reference to these telegrams to which I would direct the attention of the Senate, and ask their patience while doing it. When a telegram is dated Muscogee, Vinita, or South McAlester, or any place else in the Indian Territory, it must not be considered, as is by too many done, that it is simply from some little collection of tepees, or a small village, or something of that kind. I know that opinion prevails, and largely so, because a general and vague impression has gone abroad throughout the land, and I find it crystallized even here in this well-informed body, that the Indian Territory is inhabited by nothing but Indians, and therefore towns as we know towns in the East or Central West or any place else where they exist do not exist there.

On the contrary, towns exist in the Indian Territory which would be a credit to any State. South McAlester, Muscogee, Vinita, and a large number of other towns have electric lights, they have railroads, they have broad streets, they have stores that do a very large business, and they have schools which are supported by the subscription of citizens in the absence of any school law enabling them to have the ordinary public schools. In other words, the communities in the Indian Territory from which these telegrams come are creditable communities, even when they are compared to communities in the older States, and they are made up of energetic, law-abiding, and conservative citizens.

I thought it was well to call attention to this fact, although it may weary the patience of the Senate, because, as I stated yesterday, it has gone abroad and has appeared, even with the editorial sanction of very creditable and usually accurate newspapers, that the Indian Territory is merely a tract inhabited by a large number of Indians. Therefore I called attention yesterday to the quality of the inhabitants of that Territory, and I emphasize it to-day by calling attention to the character and quality of these towns, so that it may be clear to every Senator, as well as to the country, that the proposition to incorporate the Indian Territory with Oklahoma is not at all an unreasonable proposition and does not include the idea of bringing into citizenship a large number of Indians not familiar with our institutions and persons who have lived there without the development of their Territory.

Now, Mr. President, I send to the desk, with the permission of the Senator from Minnesota, and ask to have read the following petitions, which are directly upon the point now being discussed by the Senator from Minnesota. I would be glad if the Secretary would read, for the information of the Senate, not only the resolutions, but the names of those who signed the petitions, because the names are given, and their occupation. It therefore becomes a matter of consequence that the quality of the petitioners should go before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The names can only go into the RECORD by unanimous consent.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then I ask unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the names signed to the petitions may be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Committee on Territories, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C., Hon. A. J. Beveridge, Chairman:

We, the undersigned business men, citizens, and voters of Oklahoma City, Oklahoma County, and Territory of Oklahoma (irrespective of politics), heartily indorse the action and report of your committee to Congress in relation to the single statehood bill. Recognizing the importance of statehood, we insist that it would be to the best interests of all the citizens of Oklahoma Territory and Indian Territory that said Territories be made one State, and we earnestly request that your committee will continue to use your best endeavors to that end, and use all honorable means in securing single statehood for said Territories.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Indiana that the other paper sent to the desk by him, which is similar to the one just read, and which contains the names of a large number of signers, does not give their occupations.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the occupations of the signers to that petition are not given I do not care to have it read. I believe there are a larger number of signatures to this petition than there were to the other. I desired that the names on the first petition might be read merely to show the scope and variety of the occupations of the people in Oklahoma who ask for single statehood—that is, statehood made up of both the Indian Territory and the Territory of Oklahoma—showing that they involve every class of profession and occupation. For that reason, since in the second petition the occupations and professions of the signers are not given, I shall not ask that those signatures be read.

But, Mr. President, I call attention to the fact, in view of the remarkable convention held the day before yesterday in Oklahoma City, attended by 2,000 delegates—not mere fillers of the gallery or of room in a convention, but 2,000 delegates from all over Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, that they represented, as shown by these petitions, every class, kind, and quality of occupation which has gone to build up Oklahoma to its present prosperity and erect its remarkable cities.

I have no doubt that the Senate has noticed—I wrote down a few as they were being read off—that these petitioners include brick masons, traveling salesmen, horseshoers, merchants, farmers, liquor dealers, ministers, secretaries of Young Men's Christian Associations, wholesalers, and every part of the community, except those elements of society who, ordinarily hostile, are united upon this proposition. I was very much struck by the conjunction of the signature of a liquor dealer and that of a minister, because these are always at war; and yet, Mr. President, people who never can be reconciled upon any other proposition are brought to union by this one; and I think it is a matter of moment and consequence, showing the universality of this sentiment among the people who with their children will be interested in the outcome of this legislation, as to the importance of the committee's substitute.

I had not intended to comment upon these petitions; but as I heard those occupations read the singularity of the things to which I have called the Senate's attention struck me with such force that I felt impelled to make these few remarks. I thank the Senator from Minnesota very much for permitting me to interrupt his remarks to this length.

TUESDAY, January 13, 1903.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ELECTION OF DELEGATE FROM THE TERRITORY OF ALASKA.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

House resolution No. 375.

Resolved, That the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bill (H. R. 9865) for the election of a Delegate from the Territory of Alaska, etc., shall be in order immediately after the reading of the Journal on Wednesday, January 21, and thereafter until the said bill shall have been disposed of, this order not to conflict with appropriation bills, conference reports, or prior order of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF PUBLIC PRINTING ACT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 2296) to amend "An act approved March 2, 1895, relating to public printing," with a Senate amendment to a House amendment, which was read.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I move to disagree with the Senate amendment to the amendment of the House and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees: Mr. HEATWOLE, Mr. BOREING, and Mr. TATE.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of Executive Document No. 249, being a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Supervising Architect submitting an estimate for an appropriation for an additional building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and it was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By unanimous consent, reference of so much of the message of the President transmitting the report of the Philippine Commission as relates to a proposed appropriation was changed from the Committee on Insular Affairs to the Committee on Appropriations.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report the following bill, to meet an immediate urgent deficiency, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, from the Committee on Appropriations, and by the direction of that committee, reports an urgent deficiency bill and asks that it be considered at once.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16642) making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903.

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year 1903, namely:

PRINTING AND BINDING.

For printing and binding for the Department of Justice, to be executed under the direction of the Public Printer, $8,000.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

For fuel, as follows: For the metropolitan police, $3,000; for the fire department, $4,500; for public schools, $45,000; in all, $52,500, one-half of which shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the other half out of the Treasury of the United States.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, $40,000.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, this will be considered now.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill making appropriations for the Army. And pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to five hours, to be divided equally between the two sides, one half to be controlled by myself and the other half by the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. HAY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Army appropriation bill, and pending that motion, he asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to five hours, to be divided equally, one half of the time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. HAY. Is there objection to this request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The motion of Mr. HULL was then agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. BOUTELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16567) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that members of the committee, by sending for the bill and report, can find out very readily all the provisions of the bill, many of which are undoubtedly subject to a point of order. The committee, however, believe that matter submitted will be approved by members.

The bill carries for this year's appropriation $73,875,276.83, as against something over $90,000,000 for the present fiscal year. I do not think that it is necessary for me at this time to enter into any explanation of the bill, as that can be better done under the five-minute rule, when each of the provisions is reached in order.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is one question affecting the Army that has been the cause of widespread interest, at least this year, and that has brought out a good many suggestions as to what is best for the country to do in the future, and that is the transport service. It seems to me that at this time it is eminently proper that some member of the committee should give to the House, and through the House to the country, information as to what has been done and what can be done by the Army transport service. We all know that when the war with Spain began we had absolutely no provision for transporting troops on the sea, and when it was determined that we should invade Cuba it was necessary to gather boats wherever we could and make temporary provision for the transportation of troops from Tampa, Fla., to Santiago.

At that time the Government was compelled to take whatever vessels were available. Cattle ships were chartered, the offal of the animals was shoveled out, temporay bunks provided, and great suffering ensued on account of the lack of proper facilities for ventilation, but it was the best we could do, and the country stood it. When the Philippine Islands were taken, when the Spanish authority was destroyed there, it was recognized at once that we must have some better method than that for the transportation of troops. It was impossible, with that long voyage, to depend on commercial lines, and the Government of the United States entered the markets of the world as a purchaser of vessels. Undoubtedly we paid high prices. It was necessary that we should pay higher prices than the vessels would command for general commercial purposes in order to get them at once. We could not wait.

But out of this necessity has been developed the best transport service of any nation on earth. Troops now leave our shores at San Francisco, are landed in Manila, after almost a month on shipboard, in better condition, physically, than they were when they started from our home ports. Troops who have been in the Philippines for more than two years, greatly debilitated and run down, are landed at San Francisco in a much improved physical condition.

The boats are splendidly equipped for the purposes for which they are designed. They have taken the freight boats, not fast passenger steamers, but freight boats that make about 12 knots an hour; they have refitted them throughout so that the troops in their quarters have abundance of pure air; they have a large deck for exercise; they have their meals served entirely outside of their sleeping quarters; they have fine facilities for the preparation of their food; they have a large refrigerating plant, so there is abundance of ice; they have their cold-storage room, so there is abundance of fresh meat and vegetables; they have hospital quarters of the very best equipment; they have an inspection twice a day by the commanding officer of the boat and by the commanding officer of the troops, by the medical officer in charge, so that every detail of sanitation is carefully and thoroughly looked after and the health of the troops considered above everything else.

On a transport we allow from 100 to 120 cubic feet of air to every soldier. No crowding is ever permitted. The boat on which I went to the Philippines carried of officers and men over 1,400, yet everyone was perfectly cared for; everyone was comfortably located; everyone had his health preserved; so that the very minute those men were landed on our islands they were ready for active duty. Such a thing, in my judgment, is an impossibility on the commercial lines. On commercial lines, outside of the first cabin, you will find the accommodations in these respects a failure. Such vessels will not have proper air shafts; they will not have the large arrangement of sleeping accommodations provided for in the transport; they will not have the splendid system of baths; they will not have the commodious accommodations for the men that are necessary in order that the men may be healthy. So that, if you are considering the question of the health of the men as the great primary question for the Government to take into view, there ought to be no controversy in Congress or out of Congress as to the necessity for maintaining this transport system.

As a matter of fact, every man in the country is in favor of building up and maintaining a large Navy; and yet during the last thirty years or more we have had but one occasion to use it. It is necessary, because of the condition of all the nations of the world, to have this great arm of defense, and none of us will oppose the maintenance of all the requisites necessary for equipping and preserving at the highest efficiency a sea force able to meet unaided any other nation on the oceans of the world. We have now a perfectly equipped Army. We have our outlying possessions. We have the possibility of complications on our southern borders. And this transport service, in my judgment, is as absolutely necessary as a defensive arm of the service, if we care for our troops, as is the Navy itself or the Army itself.

But if you will examine the cost of the transport service from its inception to the present time, taking into consideration the large prices paid for vessels, the enormous sums spent for repairs; if you will make such an examination, and will charge against this service from its beginning simply what is offered today by the commercial lines, it will be readily seen that this system has been a saving to the Government in dollars and cents as well as in the health and comfort of the men.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow me two or three questions for information?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. How many boats are employed in the transport service now?

Mr. HULL. I think there are only eight now.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. How many does the Government own that may be used for this service?

Mr. HULL. I have here a table which shows that; but I have not examined it enough to answer the gentleman's question. I am going to publish the table with my remarks. I should say that the Government should keep at least six of these vessels in active operation. My friend from California [Mr. KAHN] may know more about this matter than I do.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What is the annual cost of the transport service in times of peace?

Mr. HULL. Using what vessels are necessary to be used, and putting the others out of commission, I should say it would cost us in the neighborhood of $1,000,000 a year. That is only an estimate. I can tell the gentleman the cost of a trip. Those that are out of commission cost nothing practically.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Can the gentleman tell about how many troops will probably be transported during a year?

Mr. HULL. If you should keep the army force at 15,000, I should imagine there would be an average of at least 6,000 troops transported each way every year. If the army should be increased we should transport more. You can count absolutely on at least a third of whatever army we may have being brought home and an equal number taken out every year.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. About a third each year?

Mr. HULL. Fully that.

Now, on the transport Logan, which loaded in New York in 1900 for the trip to Manila, the total expense of the entire trip from New York to Manila was $40,085.66. That vessel went by way of the Suez Canal. It paid canal charges of $12,817. It carried over there 1,492 officers and men. At commercial prices prevailing at that time the cost would have been five times that amount, but under a permanent contract as offered by one of the steamship lines recently, it would have cost almost double that, as I remember, counting the freight.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does that include the food of the men?

Mr. HULL. No, there is no food in it for men, only the food for the crew. It does not subsist the men. They get their rations; that is not paid for out of appropriation for transportation in any of these transports.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. How are the rations furnished?

Mr. HULL. Regular Army rations. If you have them transported on the commercial lines, as now proposed, the Government feeds them, furnishes their rations; that does not include the food.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have not been able to hear the remarks of the gentleman. Is there anything in this bill which proposes to dispense with the transport service?

Mr. HULL. There is not, but there is a proposition in the War Department, as I understand, for dispensing with it, and my idea of this statement to-day to the House is to give what information I have, and the gentleman can supplement that by his experience on transport.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the gentleman that so far as I am concerned, so far as my experience is concerned—and I investigated the question by talking with the captains of these transports—it is that the transports have been a great saving to the United States. In the case of the transport Grant, the figures showed that in one year's time it had saved $400,000 more than the cost of the ship itself, and the same may be said of the Sheridan.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Chairman, while I was on the transport I requested the officer in charge to give me a copy of one of his round trips. They were instructed by the War Department to keep an account of all the expense the Government was put to for operating the transport, and also to make another statement as to what would have been the cost to the Government if the same work had been done by commercial lines. Of course, it is only fair to say that in this statement the cost by commercial lines was put in at current prices, not by contract, so that it could be reduced undoubtedly under a contract.

But at the price charged then and at the prices the Government would have been compelled to pay in its time of stress, when every available ship on her coast was needed for Government service, either by purchase or charter, to do this work, no commercial line would have given any reduction whatever, in my judgment; so that while it is not a fair comparison as to what can be done now by commercial lines, it is a fair comparison of what could have been done then by commercial lines. This is the same boat, Logan, and I take it simply because it was the boat I happened to be on and had time to make the investigation. I want to say that I expect to publish this statement in full with my remarks.

Report of passengers and freight transported during voyage No. 4, sailing from San Francisco, Cal., December 15, 1900, and arriving on return March 29, 1901:

Wages of officers, wages of crew, coal, repairs, harbor fees, supplies, wharfage, pilotage, stevedoring, subsistence of officers and crews, $131,921.76.

Now, their receipts, giving credit for the number of officers and number of men and number of civilians carried, amounted to $335,996, in round numbers, as a total. There has been a good deal of talk about civilians. There is no doubt that there has been some abuse of the transport service in the way of carrying civilians, but ninety-nine one-hundredths of the civilians carried were men in the employ of the Government. For instance, one boat went over loaded with school-teachers. Other boats had a large number of teachers distributed along in the different vessels. They are all rated as civilians.

Another class of civilians which was carried, and properly so, was those that went over in the civil service of the Government—clerks in the Army, clerks for the insular government, judges, attorneys, and other officers appointed to places in the government there. If the Government had not given these people transportation on the transports at a minimum cost, we would have had to pay their fares on the regular commercial lines. Of course nobody would take an office at $100 a month, as the bulk of those did, or even $3,000 a year, uncertain as to the tenure of office, and pay all expenses to go so far from home; so that the larger part, almost the entire part, of this civilian transportation is properly chargeable to the Government.

For instance, one boat was sent over with Commissioners, men of high authority, going to the East to administer affairs. The Hancock was placed at their disposal. I have no criticism for that, but it comes out of the Army bill. Another part of the cost of the transport service was furnishing the civil government of the Philippine Islands transports to make investigation of the conditions existing in all the different islands. The Sumner was used, I think, ninety days in this work alone, not at all for the Army, and yet all charged to the Army transport service. The Government had to pay this expense and saved money by using a transport. But, to go back to this statement:

The number of persons transported on this trip was 4,669; tons of freight transported, 38,000; total cost of the voyage, $131,921. Cost by commercial lines for transporting, $335,996, for transporting 38,000 tons of mail, remains, etc., none of which will be covered by contracts now pending before the Department, for the Post-Office will have to provide for the mails $157,982, or a difference in favor of the Army transport service for this one voyage of the one steamer of $362,056.24.

The following is full statement:

When I returned I had a statement drawn off at San Francisco, and I will say to the House that I expected to have given this information last year, and would have done so, except for a continued illness that made it impossible for me to attend to anything except absolutely necessary duties during the last session of this Congress. This statement showed the number of passengers carried, also animals and freight handled by the United States Army transport service at San Francisco, Cal., only, up to and including June 30, 1901. I will not read the full amount, but simply the totals.

There were officers carried, 5,033; enlisted men carried, 133,252; civilians carried, 6,492; a total of 144,857 of men transported from San Francisco, Cal., and return.

The animals were transported on chartered vessels. There were 8,892 horses, 4,175 mules, 3,411,212 packages of freight, 33,648 pieces of baggage, 399,977 tons of freight, 29,361 tons of forage, 1,571,263 pounds of mail, all carried by the transport service, and 2,983 remains of dead soldiers brought back to this country; or a grand total in cost to the Government for all of this work from the inception of the transport service to the 30th of June, 1901, of $14,339,762.

Statement showing number of passengers carried, also animals and freight handled, by the United States Army transport service from San Francisco, Cal., up to and including June 30, 1901.

If all this had been done by commercial lines during this time I do not believe that $50,000,000 would have paid the expense. So that the transport service, to my mind, has been a measure not only of comfort, not only conducive to the health of the troops, but of absolute economy to the Government of the United States. I submit as part of my remarks, if there is no objection, a table showing the number of vessels chartered and the amount paid.

In order to bring this down to the present time, I called on the Quartermaster's Department some weeks ago for information as to what had been done at San Francisco since the 30th of June, 1901, up to the 30th of June, 1902, to the close of the last fiscal year, and I find that the number of passengers carried for that fiscal year—officers, enlisted men, and civilians—was 44,953. The number of remains of our dead soldiers, officers, and men, brought back to this country was 1,096. The number of packages of freight was 604,623; pieces of baggage, 34,085; tons of supplies, 62,899; tons of forage, 2,400.

This shows that the Army is now getting almost all of its forage in the islands. Of letter mail we carried 91,142 pounds, and that is worth, I think, at the prevailing prices for letter mail for the Orient, about $1.60 a pound. Of printed matter—newspapers, periodicals, and so forth—there were carried 925,195 pounds, and we transported in currency, for the payment of our expenses in the Philippines, $4,300,000. That would have had to be sent by express if we had been dealing with commercial lines. No animals were transported from San Francisco during the year.

I have here a statement showing the names of the transports, their original names, cost when purchased, cost of repairs, and prices received for them when sold. Although that is partly a duplicate of the other table, I will print it with my remarks.

I have a statement here showing the expenses incurred by the four Army transports in making the round voyage from San Francisco to Manila and return, and the number of passengers and amount of freight carried under the new conditions.

The total cost of the Sherman for the round trip was $67,000 in round numbers; of the Logan, $63,000; of the Thomas, $75,000, and of the Kilpatrick, a much smaller vessel, $49,000, making a total for the four vessels for the round trip of $256,680.38. The average expenditure for the four transports was a little over $64,000 each.

Now, here is what they carried: The Sherman, on her outward voyage, carried 70 first-class and 84 second-class passengers and 1,700 tons of freight. On the inward voyage she carried 135 first-class, and 312 second-class passengers, 17 remains of dead soldiers, and 1,675 tons of freight.

The Logan, out, 47 first-class passengers, 42 second-class, freight tons 675, making a total of first-class passengers of 656, 4,225 second-class, remains 73, and freight tons 7,238.

In addition to the above, there were transported on the four ships 25 first-class passengers, 3 second-class, and 42 tons of freight from Manila to Nagasaki not included in the above statement. There were also transported from San Francisco to Manila 155,289 pounds of mail matter, and from Manila to San Francisco 40,044 pounds of mail matter, of which 94,085 pounds is reported as letter mail and 101,148 pounds as printed matter. That is not included in the estimates; not in any estimate of cost of service to the Government in any contract statements from the War Department.

The cost of transportation of above-mentioned passengers and freight, at the rates offered by Mr. Frank Waterhouse, would be as follows:

656 first-class passengers, at $100 each	$65,600.00
4,328 second-class passengers, at $25 each	108,200.00
7,238 tons freight, at $4.25 per ton	30,761.50
Total cost	204,761.50
The total expenditure for running the transports shown by the first sheet is	256,680.38
The total cost for transportation of the passengers and freight shown on page 2 at the rates given by Mr. Waterhouse would be	204,561.50
Showing a saving by commercial ships of	52,118.88

Or an average saving on each of the four ships of $13,029.72.

In the foregoing calculation no account is taken of the transportation of passengers and freight from Manila to Nagasaki, nor for the transportation of mail matter. Allowing one-fourth rate for passengers and freight between Manila and Seattle, and for the transportation of mail matter at the rates paid by the Post-Office Department for its transportation on ships of American registry, the following is a credit to the Army transport service, viz:

25 first-class passengers, Manila to Nagasaki, at $25 each	$625.00
3 second-class passengers, at $6.25 each	18.75
42 tons of freight, at $1 per ton	42.00
94,085 pounds letter mail, at $1 per pound	150,536.00
101,248 pounds printed matter, at 8 cents per pound	8,099.84
Total	159,321.59
Deducting the amount in favor of commercial ships above stated	52,118.88
Leaves a balance in favor of the Army transport service as a saving to the Government on the four transports of	107,202.71

I have also here a statement showing the number of officers and enlisted men to be transported from the United States to the Philippines and those to be returned to the United States under orders of the War Department designating troops for service in the Philippines and those to be relieved from duty there and showing comparative costs by the transports sailing each month and by commercial lines at the rates offered in recent bids, including the transportation of regulation allowance of baggage of officers serving in over-sea possessions.

The order provides for the troops to be transported on transports sailing each month commencing February 1 and ending September, 1903, seven sailings each way.

The number of officers to be transported to Philippines is 437; enlisted men, 7,308.

I think that answers the question of the gentleman from Indiana as to the number of troops to be transported.

The number of officers to be returned from the Philippines to the United States is 366; enlisted men, 7,216; total officers, 803; total enlisted men, 14,524. The cost for the transportation of these officers at the rates paid would be $80,300, and for enlisted men, $363,100.

The officers transported to the Philippines would be entitled to the transportation of an allowance on baggage of change of station 2,315,100 pounds, and those returned to the United States approximately 2,000,000 pounds; total, 4,315,100 pounds, or 2,157 tons weight. This baggage, transported by commercial ship, would be rated at 40 cubic feet per ton, and would unquestionably amount to 4,200 tons ship measurement, which, at $4.25 per ton, would amount to $17,850. This matter of cost of transportation of officers and men would make the total cost of this movement by commercial ships $461,250.

The average cost per round voyage of an army transport is ascertained from reports of transport quartermasters to be approximately $65,000. Seven round voyages would therefore cost the Department approximately $455,000, which is $6,250 less than the cost for commercial ships, as shown above.

Upon the transports upon which the officers and enlisted men and baggage would be transported there will be additional passenger accommodations and freight capacities as follows: From the United States to Manila 471 cabin accommodations, 4,682 troop accommodations, 11,707 tons of freight space; and on return voyage 542 cabin accommodations, 4,774 troop accommodations, and 11,862 tons of freight space.

The records show that upon each of the voyages of the transports the cabin accommodations are fully occupied and that large numbers of discharged short-term men, convalescents, and civilian employees who are entitled to public transportation are being carried; also that large quantities of supplies are transported to Manila. It is estimated that of this class of passengers and freight there would be carried by the seven round voyages of the transports to and from the Philippines, cabin passengers, 300; enlisted men, employees, etc., 2,800, and freight and supplies, 12,000 tons.

Additional to this there are many remains being returned to the United States; large quantities of mail matter are being carried each way, and large amounts of money are being sent to the Philippines, the transportation of which is not included in the foregoing calculations, but the cost of this would be very great by commercial ships.

Based upon the reports of the transport quartermasters as to the number of remains and quantities of mail matter transported, upon round voyages, of 4 of the transports sailing during the past summer and fall, the value of this transportation on the transports would be $280,760; saving on transportation of officers, men, and baggage, $6,250; total estimated saving by transports, $375,010.

Now, that only includes cabin passengers entitled to be sent there by the Government. It includes Members of Congress. I might stop long enough to say that a good many Members of Congress went over in 1901 and there was some criticism made that they took advantage of Government transports to go there and to Cuba and to Porto Rico. I want to say to this committee that in my judgment it would have been a good thing for this country if every member of this House and Senate could have made the trip and seen the necessities of the Government in the progress of this work. I think my friend from Tennessee will agree to that. [Laughter.]

The cost of this, at the commercial rates, that would all be done by the Government, not by the transportation of the Army and supplies, but from other transportation, would be $88,000, to be added to the total I have given for Army transportation alone. Additional to this, there are many remains being returned to the United States and large quantities of mail matter are being carried each way, and large amounts of money are being sent to the Philippines, the transportation of which is not included in the foregoing calculations, but the cost of which would be very great by commercial ships.

Based upon the reports of the transport quartermasters as to the number of remains and quantities of mail matter transported upon round voyages of four of the transports sailing during the past summer and fall, the value of this transportation on the transports would be $280,760, and the saving of transportation of officers, men, and baggage $6,250, making a total estimated saving by transport of $375,010 that the Government will pay out of its Treasury on other bills than Army bills if you abolish the Army transport service.

The reports on file in the Quartermaster-General's Office show that during the past seven months there have been transported on the transports from the United States to the Philippines United States currency to the amount of $4,000,000. Credit is taken on the reports for this transportation at the rate of five-eighths of 1 per cent for each $1,000. At this rate the cost of transportation of this sum by commercial lines during the seven months covered by the contemplated movement of troops would be an additional credit of $25,000 for the transport service.

Now, I have here a statement showing the comparative cost for the transportation of passengers and freight between San Francisco and the Philippines by the transport ships and the commercial lines, upon a basis of the bids recently received for such transportation from Seattle, based upon the round voyage of the Army transport Sheridan from September 1, 1902, to October 31, 1902, compiled by the general superintendent of Army transport service at San Francisco and submitted to the Quartermaster-General's Office.

Now, before going to this I want to say that neither myself nor any member of the Military Committee has any interest in the controversy between San Francisco and Seattle. That has nothing to do with this question. The transport service can be kept up and run from one port or the other as may be for the best interests of the Government. The Committee on Military Affairs have no interest in the question as to what ports they shall sail from. That is a question outside of the one I am trying to present to the House, so that in the argument whether it shall be from Seattle or San Francisco, that will be for the Administration to decide. I do believe that we should take some action, if necessary, to prevent the discontinuance of the transport service.

Now, on this list is a statement of the outward trip from San Francisco to Manila: Twenty officers, 53 civilians, 9 children, 61 soldiers, and so on down the list—I will not take the time to read them in full—but the total cost for the round trip was $67,772. Now, the freight outward was 1,950 tons from San Francisco to Manila, at $4.25 per ton, making $8,287.50; and 50 tons from San Francisco to Guam, at $4.25 per ton, $212.50. I do not understand that the commercial lines run to Guam. It is a little port aside from their track, and it would not justify their going twenty-four hours out of their way to touch there for this small amount of freight. The mail consisted of 1,780⅛ pounds of letter mail from San Francisco to Manila, at $1.60 per pound, making $2,849.20; 35,185 pounds of printed matter from San Francisco to Manila, at 8 cents per pound, $2,814.80.

Now, on the return trip there were 1,350 tons of freight from Manila to San Francisco, at $4.25, making $5,727.50; 11 remains, Manila to San Francisco, at $100 each, $1,100; 6,398 pounds of letter mail, Manila to San Francisco, at $1.60 per pound, $10,236.80; 3,511 pounds of printed matter, Manila to San Francisco, at 8 cents a pound, $280.88; making a total for freight of $31,519.

The expenditures on the outward voyage amounted to $46,070.20, and on the return voyage, $27,439.58; making a total cost for the round voyage of $73,509.82.

Now, this represents the difference in favor of the transport service on the sailing of one transport. Upon the same basis and with the same number of passengers and quantities of freight transported on twelve sailing during the year the net difference in favor of the transport service would be $18,481.36, which, multiplied by 12, is $221,776.32.

In order to give the House a detailed statement, I submit, in full, the following table:

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, in view of these actual figures, which are susceptible of absolute demonstration, that for this Government to deliberately abandon the transport service, which has been built up at such expense, and sell these vessels at the small sums that could be realized from their sale—not much over 10 per cent, if that, on the cost of the vessels—and depend on the commercial lines to do this business for the Government, will not only impose a very large additional burden upon the Government, but, in addition, will be an absolute wrong upon the soldiers of the country who may be transported to or from these far-away islands of the Pacific.

Mr. MADDOX. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. MADDOX. Does the gentleman think that the existing conditions, or those likely to exist, justify us in keeping all these transports in service?

Mr. HULL. I should say no; not all of them.

Mr. MADDOX. Then another question, for information: What are the present regulations about transporting civilians on these transports?

Mr. HULL. I understand there is absolutely no transportation given, except to those in the employ of the Government.

Mr. MADDOX. None at all?

Mr. HULL. None at all, as I understand.

A MEMBER. But the families of Government employees are included?

Mr. HULL. The families, of course, can go, and ought to go. These vessels do all the transport work, not only for the Army, but for the civil government of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. MADDOX. Then I understand the policy is to keep just so many of these vessels in service as we may need.

Mr. HULL. That is all.

Now, as to the other proposition, I want to say that we have a surplus now beyond what we need for actual service. The Government has undertaken to sell a few of these vessels, and if you will look up the records you will see that it has not received in this way 10 per cent of the cost of the vessels. These vessels are in good condition——

Mr. MADDOX. Just another question, if the gentleman pleases.

Mr. HULL. I prefer the gentleman should wait until I get through this proposition. These vessels, we think, that are not needed should be put out of commission. If these surplus vessels should be sold the Government in twenty years would not receive enough from the sale to justify selling, and then we are to take into consideration the possibility that we may need them any year on either the Atlantic or the Pacific coast. This to my mind is reason enough for their being kept by the Government.

In this country we have less than one-hundredth part of the vessels to draw upon that Great Britain has; and yet Great Britain during her African war had great difficulty in securing proper transportation for her troops. In order to send troops, she was compelled to limit the men to about 70 cubic feet of air for each man, and in the Tropics that is not enough. As I have said, Great Britain could call on 100 vessels to our 1, so that the delay in fitting out the transport service would be nothing for that Government compared with what it would be for ours. And yet with all her resources, with the great fleets at the command of that Government, she could not take care of her troops as we did of ours. In that respect we set an example to all the nations of the world. We showed how a free people can take care of free men who are fighting for her flag in any quarter of the globe.

So that upon the humanitarian ground alone, if there should be no difference in the matter of cost, I should say that our Government would be doing a wrong, while we hold the Philippines, in entirely abolishing or doing away with the transport service.

I will now yield to my friend from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX].

Mr. MADDOX. The gentleman has anticipated in a very large measure the question which I intended to ask him. I understand him to say that while we are building up a powerful Navy it is of equal importance to have a sufficient number of transports.

Mr. HULL. The suggestion has just been made to me by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] that in our service these ships may be used to good advantage as training ships for the Navy—educating a naval militia. That is a very good suggestion. But if there were absolutely no present use for a number of these vessels, if nothing were to be done except putting them out of commission, I say the amount of money which the Government would receive from their sale is so infinitesimally small—if thirty years from now we had to buy up and refit vessels for this purpose, and recognizing that there may be enough advance in shipbuilding within that time to make these vessels obsolete, still I think they would answer at least a temporary and necessary purpose—but if these vessels should be needed only once in thirty years, it would pay the Government to keep them.

We have been at great expense in building up this service. We have reached a point where we can maintain it at less expense than that at which any commercial line on earth can do this work for us; and by doing it ourselves we insure the health and comfort of our men, and no commercial line will do that.

The commercial line that might engage in this business for the Government would receive large subsidies for its line of ships in the way of exclusive contracts. Such a line working for the Government would be virtually beyond competition from any other line; and we would pay more money for this service than it now costs us, while we should be sacrificing the comfort and health of our soldiers in such a transfer of the business. When we have destroyed our transport service and destroyed competition among commercial lines by building up one to the exclusion of others we will have great difficulty in renewing our contracts on as good terms as now offered.

Every Government transport has perfect hospital accommodations. The hospital is crowded when you start from Manila for the States and is practically empty when you land at San Francisco. The commercial lines have none. They agree, however, that they will fit up limited accommodations for hospital service; but the best part of our vessel is given over to the sick soldiers for their hospital and they are cared for before the well men are cared for, while on the commercial lines they will simply be taken because they have to be taken, not because they are desirable.

Now, Mr. Chairman, on my return from San Francisco I called on the master of transportation for a full statement as to results of the transport service, although at that time there was no proposition to do away with it. He has given me one, which I have had here for over a year in my possession, and I ask permission to put it in with my remarks, without reading it. If there is no objection, I will do so. I also have a letter from the Quartermaster-General, transmitting a large part of this data I have read to the House, which I shall also put in with my remarks. I do not desire to take the time of the committee to read this in full, but I will say to the committee that a full reading of the statement on the transport business will well repay every member of the House for the time which he takes to give it a careful reading. I now reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I have listened to my friend with great interest. These transports, as I understand, are required for present and immediate future service. As to those not required, he suggests that they go out of commission, as a matter of insurance for that matter, and then it would be like unto the coast defenses, the maintenance of the machinery of the Army, otherwise a matter of readiness, which a wise government would resort to in the event of emergencies.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman from Illinois has expressed my idea much better than I did myself, but I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that they are now transferring several of these vessels to the Navy in place of trying to sell them, and the surplus vessels can all be absorbed by the Navy on the lines suggested by my friend from California [Mr. KAHN] and on the lines upon which they have already done with those which have been transferred to the Navy.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. In the estimate he has made as to the cost by contract as contrasted with the cost which the Government is paying for the transport service, is it not a fact that, although the amount is more by the contract service, the quarters of the soldiers are not nearly as good?

Mr. HULL. Oh, they can not be as good; that is absolutely true.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And is it not a fact that the steerage passenger in the ordinary merchant vessel has not anything like the quarters which are given to the ordinary soldiers in the transports to Manila?

Mr. HULL. The steerage passenger in the ordinary vessel is crowded into the dark, ill-ventilated hold of the ship, while the soldiers have large, airy, well-ventilated quarters in every transport which has been fitted up for the carrying of troops.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And notwithstanding that the cost by contract is greater than the cost by transport?

Mr. HULL. The cost by transport is greater, and counting the mail matter and the remains brought over and the civilians transported, for which we will have to pay out of some appropriation by Congress, the cost will run into millions of dollars every year more by the contract service than by keeping up the transport service.

Mr. KAHN. The mail matter is a very important feature.

Mr. HULL. Yes, and there is another thing which the transport service does, which I might suggest to this committee. When you make a contract for the delivery of officers and men at Manila, or forage or freight or mail, you have to then keep up a certain number of ships to ply between the islands, and pay additional large sums to have your troops carried from Manila, say, to Iloilo and Sabu, or any of the posts in the southern islands away from Manila, and largely, as my friend will remember, to even distribute troops upon the island on Luzon alone.

Now, the cost of the transport service figured here does not mean simply to Manila, but it is the round trip, and that includes not only going to Manila but also to these other islands where they want to put these troops, so that while you can not get those figures here—I could not in time—it will add a great many thousand dollars additional to the cost of the Government by doing it by contract with the commercial lines. For instance, the Logan, on which I went over—and I only refer to the Logan, as I said before, because that is the vessel I went on—took over fourteen hundred and some odd troops and officers.

Part of them were taken to Samar and landed there, and others to other islands and landed, and troops taken from each post for transportation back to the United States, and that was all in the cost of the round trip; while with your commercial lines it means that they land at Manila, and then the Government pays a very high interisland rate to these little vessels, which could not do this service with any comfort to the men nor any promptness at all. It is now done by the transports without one dollar of additional expense to the Government of the United States. I spent twenty-two days on the Sumner with General Chaffee when he went around the islands to inspect the posts, and there was not a post that we landed at where we did not take out fresh beef and supplies for that post, so that the men could have the advantage of a change of rations.

That would not be done by your commercial lines. That expense would all have been in addition to what is figured out here. The smaller part of our troops will be kept in Luzon. The interisland business is a large one that the Government must perform, and by keeping up the transport service it is performed without an additional dollar of expense over that shown in these round-trip expenses of the transports, because the expense is figured from the time they leave San Francisco until they reach San Francisco again. I want to say very frankly that if there is no other way to prohibit the sale and the breaking up of this transport service I should favor an amendment that would make it impossible for the Department to do away with that service until further action by Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the gentleman another question. Have any of these transports been sold?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. How many?

Mr. HULL. As an answer I submit General Ludington's statement to the committee.

The statement is as follows:

Statement showing the names of Army transports which have been sold, the price paid for them by the War Department, the flag which they were under when purchased, amounts expended on them for fitting and repairs while in the Army transport service, not including running expenses, and the amounts received for them when sold.

Name.	Cost.	Flag.	Repairs and refitting.	Sold for—	Remarks.
Rawlins	.....	American..	$169,887.45	$200,000.00	This vessel was purchased by the Navy Department for $475,000, and was transferred to the War Department by an Executive order without cost to the appropriations of the War Department.
Terry	$150,000	.....do	36,827.15	19,600.00	The Terry was purchased in December, 1898, and fitted up for the distribution of troops and supplies in Cuba. Upon the reduction of the military service in Cuba the vessel, being no longer required, was withdrawn and sent to New York. There being no need for her service in the Philippines or the United States, it was determined to dispose of her.
McPherson	250,000.00	Dutch.....	277,818.18	11,150.00	This transport was wrecked on the coast of Cuba in February, 1901, and was raised and delivered in New York Harbor by a wrecking company under contract at a cost of $70,000. On arrival in New York it was necessary to put temporary repairs on her bottom to keep her afloat, at a cost of $5,000, and to make permanent repairs so that the vessel would be seaworthy it was ascertained that it would cost at least $150,000. It was therefore determined to offer the vessel for sale, and as it was costing $35 per day to care for the vessel and keep her afloat, the Department, after several efforts to dispose of her, accepted the highest price offered as being more economical than to longer retain possession of her.
Rosecrans	147,200.00	American..	101,394.77	50,000.00	This vessel was sold, the Department having no further use for her services.
Sedgwick	200,000.00	British.....	297,759.91	35,000.00	Upon the discontinuance of the transport service on the Atlantic the Sedgwick was laid up, it being ascertained that the ship required extensive repairs to put her in seaworthy condition, at an approximate cost of $125,000, and there being no need of her service in the Philippines or on the Pacific, she was sold.
Egbert	200,000.00	.....do	244,715.85	50,000.00	This vessel was sold, the Department having no further need for her services.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Do you know whether there is any intention on the part of the Secretary of War to sell any more?

Mr. HULL. My impression is that the authority of the Secretary of War to sell would only come in when they were condemned by a board of officers. I do not believe he has the right to sell otherwise. Now, he may have a different view of that. He is an able lawyer and a great administrative officer, and would surely comply with the law.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the gentleman from Iowa that my views accord exactly with his on this transport service, and I for one would be perfectly willing to support a law or an amendment absolutely prohibiting the sale of these transports. They are a most excellent part of the Government service.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Can the gentleman state how much these transports brought that were sold?

Mr. HULL. The old Obdam, that cost us between four and five hundred thousand dollars, was a comparative wreck when sold, and she only brought about $11,000, I believe. Gentlemen will understand that the cost of refitting these transports was often as large as the original cost. They were nearly all freight boats, and the Government had to put them in dry dock and employ a large force and expend a large sum of money to fit them for transport ships for the accommodation of our soldiers and officers.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. And that refitting would destroy their usefulness as freighters?

Mr. HULL. They can carry all the freight that the Government wants to carry in them, but they would not be valuable as freight boats for general commercial purposes unless they were reorganized. The gentleman can understand that that would be easily done, because it costs much more to construct than it does to tear out. The expense of tearing out would not be very great.

The table given by General Ludington shows about what they would sell for. The Rosecrans sold for $50,000. This vessel was sold, the Department having no further use for her services. Now, in answer to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], I will say that I assume that if they could sell the Rosecrans they could sell any other vessel. The amount that she brought, however, was nearer the cost than the amount brought by some of the others. The Rosecrans cost about $300,000 altogether.

Mr. KAHN. They sold four or five of them.

Mr. HULL. They sold the Sedgwick.

Mr. KAHN. And the Egbert.

Mr. HULL. The Egbert and the McPherson. She was wrecked. That is the one I called the Obdam. But my judgment is that under the strict construction of the law the only way these vessels could be sold would be to convene an Army board and condemn them. That may have been done when these were sold.

Mr. STEELE. I should like to ask the gentleman what is the main argument in favor of the sale of these transports by the Secretary of War?

Mr. HULL. So far as I know, and I do not want to state positively because I did not call upon him for that, I think the main argument is that he wants the Government to go out of this kind of business.

Mr. CORLISS. I observe on page 25 of the bill, under the head of "Barracks and quarters," an appropriation of over $4,000,000. Is that intended to cover the improvement of the existing military posts in our own country?

Mr. HULL. That $4,000,000?

Mr. CORLISS. Yes.

Mr. HULL. That is all for this country.

Mr. CORLISS. Why is it not itemized in this appropriation?

Mr. HULL. I will say to the gentleman that Congress never could have the information that the Secretary of War has through the Quartermaster's Department, which is the construction department of the Army—it never could have the information necessary to segregate this matter, and if you begin the segregation of these items, with the very best information, during a short session of Congress, however diligently the committee might examine it, the result would be undoubtedly worse than having the Department dispose of the matter.

Mr. CORLISS. That is the information I desired.

Mr. HULL. We never have segregated these items, and in my judgment it would be bad legislation to segregate them for the reason I have given.

Mr. CORLISS. Now, with reference to Fort Wayne, which is in my State, there have been recommendations of certain improvements at that post. Under this appropriation the Secretary of War has absolute power to make any improvement deemed to be necessary for the benefit of the Army at that place. Is that statement correct?

Mr. HULL. I did not hear the gentleman, as another gentleman was speaking to me.

Mr. CORLISS. I asked if the Secretary of War had power, under this provision, to make the necessary improvements at Fort Wayne?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman that he has consumed an hour.

Mr. HULL. I did not understand I was limited to one hour. I have no desire to consume any further time, but will endeavor to explain other matters under the five-minute rule, if I can.

Mr. CORLISS. I find in the bill an appropriation of nearly $1,000,000 for the construction of a cable in Alaska. Are these to be Government cables?

Mr. HULL. They are entirely military cables.

Mr. CORLISS. Is it an extension of existing cables already constructed?

Mr. HULL. Yes; it makes connection for this Government—one of them—to go over the Canadian line connecting with our own line already built.

Mr. CORLISS. And when opened, would be open to commercial business?

Mr. HULL. Yes. In fuller answer to the gentleman's first question, in another bill there is another appropriation for buildings. Where the cost is more than $20,000, they would not be paid out of this appropriation, but the sundry civil bill carries an appropriation where detailed estimates are given for a building authorized by law, that is not under this lump sum.

GENERAL REMARKS REGARDING TRANSPORT SERVICE.

Upon the declaration of war with Spain in April, 1898, the Quartermaster's Department was called upon to provide means of transportation for the army to Cuba. The charter of every available steamship under American registry on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts was considered in connection with this service. These ships were carefully and thoroughly inspected to ascertain their seaworthiness and suitability for transporting troops and supplies on the ocean, and if found suitable were chartered and fitted up for service.

The Navy Department had already secured the largest and most commodious of American vessels for service as auxiliary cruisers, and those left available for transport service were of the smaller coast-line steamships used for the transportation of freight, with limited accommodations upon them for cabin passengers. From this class of steamships there were chartered the fleet of transports, about thirty in number, which were hastily fitted up for the transportation of officers, men, horses, and all the necessary supplies and impedimenta required for an army in the field.

To provide quarters upon these vessels for the enlisted men to be transported, it was necessary to build bunks on the main and 'tween decks of the ships, and to render these quarters habitable ports were required to be cut in the ships, and wind sails provided to force air through these ports while en route.

Upon these hastily fitted up transports, the army of General Shafter was transported to Santiago, and after its successful mission in Cuba was returned to the United States, and subsequently the armies of occupation of that island and Porto Rico were transported from the United States on some of these vessels.

From these movements it was manifest that such ships were illy suited for service as troop transports for the Army. The quarters of the men were crowded, poorly ventilated, and unsanitary, causing more or less suffering among the troops, particularly while in the warm climate of the West Indies.

The success of the naval fleet in the bay of Manila and the call for an army to operate on land in that distant archipelago rendered necessary the charter of a large fleet of ships on the Pacific coast for the transportation of the army on a voyage of nearly 7,000 miles.

Fortunately, on the Pacific coast there were numerous trans-Pacific steamships of large capacity which were available for use of the Government in this emergency. These vessels were fitted up for the accommodation of men and supplies, and the army of occupation was successfully landed in Manila.

Although these ships were commodious and quarters of the enlisted men upon them not overcrowded, it was not possible to make them ideal troopships for a long voyage in the Tropics, with their loads of human freight.

After mature consideration it was decided to purchase steamships suitable for conversion into Army transports. Several large steamships were tendered for sale to the Government by the Atlantic Transport Line, which had a fleet of vessels engaged in the transportation of cattle and dressed meats from the United States to Europe. Seven ships were purchased from that steamship line. The Department also acquired, by purchase, seven other steamships. These purchases were made in the summer of 1898, and the ships were hastily fitted up for the transportation of troops, animals, and supplies and the chartered transports which had been in service between the United States and the West Indies were discharged.

The owned transports were found to be admirably adapted for the service, but there were still lacking in them such accommodations as would make them ideal troopships for long voyages on the ocean. Plans and specifications were therefore prepared for the conversion of these ships into commodious and comfortable transports, and, as they could be spared from the service, one or more of them at a time, contracts were made with leading shipbuilding companies to overhaul and fit them, in accordance with these specifications. Upon completion of three of these ships, viz, Grant, Sherman, and Sheridan, each of which had been fitted to accommodate over 1,800 enlisted men, the three ships sailed from New York to Manila in the winter of 1898-99, each carrying one full regiment, a battalion of another regiment, and a large quantity of military stores.

Other transports were subsequently fitted up in similar manner, every possible care being taken to make them in every sense the most complete and perfect vessels for the safe and comfortable transportation of men.

The quarters for the enlisted men were provided with metal berths, insuring cleanliness, and are amply ventilated and lighted by electricity; large refrigerating plants were installed upon the ships for the preservation of fresh meats and vegetables for the entire voyage, and ample galleys provided for the preparation of food in the most approved manner. Hospitals were also fitted up for the care and treatment of the sick, with isolation wards for the perfect isolation and treatment of any contagious disease which may develop upon the voyage.

The representatives of a number of other nations have asked for and have been furnished with copies of the plans and specifications under which our transports have been fitted up.

Nearly every ship sailing from Manila had on board about 100 sick, who were provided with every attention and comfort in the transport hospitals that would be found in any well-regulated hospital ashore.

During the uprising in China in 1900 the United States was enabled by the possession of a well organized transport fleet to place its Army and supplies in China promptly and in excellent condition.

Of the many thousands of persons who have been transported on the vessels of the Army transport service since its inception, not one life has been sacrificed by reason of any fault in the fittings or accommodations upon the Army transports.

In view of this excellent record, and of the experience of the Department in its futile efforts to secure suitable commercial ships for the transportation of the armies during the war with Spain, and the further fact that when withdrawn from active service the transports can not be advantageously disposed of by sale, I am firmly convinced that, even though circumstances should permit the withdrawal of the transports from regular line service to the Philippine Islands, it would be wise policy to retain a sufficient number of transports as a part of the equipment of the Army, to be economically cared for and kept in such condition as to be promptly available for any emergency which may arise requiring the transportation of troops on the ocean.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. I will now yield to the gentleman from New York to move that the committee rise for the purpose of having a bill printed.

APPENDIX.

UNITED STATES ARMY TRANSPORT SERVICE OF THE PACIFIC.

The Army transport service—the principal branch of which has its headquarters in this city, so far as its headquarters can be said to exist outside of Washington—is no longer in its infancy. From its incipient stages it has progressed to high and efficient organization on a permanent basis.

Among those familiar with its operations it has ceased long ago to be regarded as an experiment, and has come to be considered a demonstration. It has been conceded a place as the prototype and module of a very successful system of over-sea military transportation. In certain lines, for instance, during the time the powers were making preparations for the occupation of China, it set the fashion for the German Government in operations conducted from this port by her agents. As an essential adjunct to the maintenance of an insular force it has established and sustained itself, and it recommends itself to the authorities and the public as a most perfect and successful ferry to our outlying ports, and as absolutely necessary from the administrative standpoint.

It has survived the period when it was most subject to criticism and attack, and mistrust has given way since its methods and processes have acquired the sanction of successfulness and highly gratifying results. I doubt if there is any element of criticism that has not been wholly disarmed by the achievements of the service. It has stood the most dissentient and exacting test of all—the stolid criticism of the landsman. It has been an emergency operation conducted among a public in profound peace, and has been required to maintain a standard that would never have been imposed upon it by a people subjected to the condition and excitements of war; but I do not believe there is anything in the public mind that would tend to put the transport service in a defensive attitude. I might furnish you a mass of accumulative data in an undigested form; but such is my concern as to what deductions are made that I shall wish to accompany it with some inferences that are natural, and these are certainly entitled to prior consideration to those which may be merely possible.

Had the emergency requiring the establishment and organization of the transport service rapidly developed, the task devolving on its organizers would have been different from what it was under the slow and indirect manner in which the real situation in the Philippines was made apparent. The magnitude of the work to be accomplished by the service did not come to light until actual entrance by the activities it subserved had been made through its agencies upon the ground which it was supplying the force to occupy.

With the fall of Manila and the destruction of the Spanish fleet our Government placed itself under obligations and responsibilities it had up to that date made no preparation to assume. When a fleet of war vessels of the United States Government appeared in Manila Bay and destroyed Spanish authority in the Philippines by annihilating its symbol and support, it by that act incurred the moral and legal responsibility to the citizens and to the world to reestablish authority and some system of government in the place where the exercise of such functions had been interrupted by its act.

This Government was at that time without any representation in force and without means of asserting its position in the islands other than those supplied by the Navy in the fleet there present. It then devolved on this Government to provide a force sufficient to establish its control in the islands, which, considering the menace of Spanish hostility, the uncertainty of native sentiment, and the large allowance necessary to be made in numbers in operating an army under climatic and local conditions that were alien and new, would necessarily be large and was not at that time in existence.

But this necessity had another and perhaps a graver import than that of the effort to provide a sufficient force—the necessity of providing under such hazardous alternatives ocean transportation over such a long distance for the body of men requisite—this to be provided from materials wholly lacking and not certainly obtainable. The establishment of a line of transports from New York to Manila, over a route leading close to Spanish shores and through a neutral canal, was not at that time to be thought of. Shipping having received a very noticeable impetus in the Pacific, tonnage on this coast was very fully employed, and in many cases at rates involving surtaxes and primages on passengers and freights, without this Government having entered the market as a bidder.

The Navy could be of no assistance at that time, as it was itself under such stress as to be straining all its facilities and resources, and was even increasing the number of its own auxiliary vessels, by which means many of the few available ships were withdrawn from the market. Very little of this business could be done at Seattle, for the facilities that could be developed for handling and equipping ships in that harbor were at that time an unknown quantity and rather problematical.

It transpired then that San Francisco rather than New York, that San Francisco rather than Seattle, and that the Army itself rather than assisted in any respect by the Navy, must evolve a transport system, and it became incumbent upon the Quartermaster's Department of the Army to receive the troops destined for the Philippines at the end of the transcontinental transportation lines, as it did at the point of their muster, and provide them with over-sea transportation to Manila—a task of a magnitude that had never been dreamed of as a possibility of the marine history of the Pacific under any contingency whatever.

Fortunately, the army to be transported was not in readiness, and while the situation urged their being sent forward, they were not in a condition to be dispatched. Time was thus afforded which rendered it possible to mature and develop plan and system.

Under this exigency the Quartermaster's Department entered the market as a charterer of tonnage. Three ships were secured for the service, designed to be sufficient to carry upward of 2,000 men, composing the first expedition. These vessels were chartered under the only terms the Department at that time was in a position to accept with reference to their operation, there being no marine office yet organized in the Department.

The entire matter of fitting, management, and control was left to the owners. Practically they were to deliver a certain number of passengers to a certain destination for the Government. The details were theirs to arrange. The result of this expedition served to emphasize the necessity of a marine office within the Department. The management of the business of this expedition on its marine or contract side was unfortunate. One system of arrangement of bunks was devised, the ships being open more or less to inspection while they were being installed, and the owners were compelled, after the fittings were nearly complete, to adopt a more rational system by the mere weight of public opinion.

The bunks had been bunched together in a manner admirably adopted to the idea of saving the sawing of lumber, without reference to passages for the convenience of men, and without consideration as to air, ventilation, etc. Men were to have crept one after another into the first of a line of bunks, through an opening merely sufficient to admit him, the first man to pass from bunk to bunk until he came to the last one, those following taking the last one left, and thus they were to stow themselves away in berths that were ventilated none at all and lighted never.

The necessity for forced draft for the ventilation of the troop decks was overlooked or neglected. Galley facilities were slighted. In other words, the soldier was to be sent to sea under conditions as to which his own good, his health, and his comfort had not been considered. It was quickly recognized that other than contract provision should be made for the long and wearing trip to the Philippines. The only acceptable system would be the one the Government alone could supply, the first consideration to be the condition, comfort, and health of the men to be carried.

The formation of a marine office as an auxiliary to the Quartermaster's Department in the handling of a vast system of water transportation, then, was logical. Such an office, or system of offices, rather, there being several centers to these operations, was immediately formed, the first efforts of the office organized at this port being directed to securing in the largest possible measure into its own hands and under its own control as much of the management and supervision of the chartered ships as was consistent with their private ownership, the day of the Government-owned vessel not having yet arrived.

The transport service of the department at San Francisco thus came into existence with a full force of clerks for the expeditious handling of baggage and cargo, and a competent corps of inspectors for the protection of the Department—to inspect paint, coal, supplies, stores, fittings, etc. Wharfage facilities were obtained, so that the service would have a seat for the handling of its ships and the dispatch of its business. The expansions from this point have been gradual and rational. No step has been ruefully taken.

The business the service has handled is phenomenal. The wharf at which it transacts its business has become famous. Folsom street dock is known further, more widely, and to more people than all the other docks of the port taken together. Since the opening of its business there has been an average of one sailing every five days. The number of people handled in one direction only, from San Francisco to Manila, is upward of 100,000, and nearly the same number has been brought back. This multitude has been transported over a very long route—one of the longest in the world—in ships that were built for other trades and in many cases ill adapted to this service, and not one life has ever been lost that is chargeable to mismanagement or incompetency. The service has succeeded in adapting itself perfectly to one of the greatest enterprises in history.

The service is wholly independent of and not at all indebted to the Navy. Its success is entirely to the credit of the Army and to the various elements of marine, nautical, and business assistance it has received from the ranks of civil life. The machinery of the Navy might have been found slow and cumbersome had it been called upon, instead of the Army, to deal with the emergency which has been successfully met. Perfect elasticity was required.

The chartered ship has been gradually replaced by the Government vessel, which is entirely under control. There is now no delay or dispute in fixing responsibility. The crews of the vessels are neatly uniformed, and with the adoption of a term of enlistment the discipline will be of the best.

One of the great departments of the service is that devoted to the reconstruction of vessels, of adapting them to our needs and requirements, and of putting them in a state of efficiency. In many cases we were compelled to take ships that were built entirely with a view to freight trade, and it was necessary to construct in them entire new decks. The passenger ship and the freight ship are of separate and distinct classes, and to adapt the freighter to be classed as a passenger ship requires very extensive work of such a nature as to entirely change their classification with Lloyd's.

Such an alteration results in increasing to a great extent the value of the vessel, but we have found it necessary on more than one occasion on account of the lack of suitable ships to do this, and, moreover, the time given for such adaptation has usually been only a few days. The service on the eastern coast, with its greater accessibility to the ship markets of the world, in due time supplied us with ships of the very first class with which our service is now maintained, but during the year 1898, the time such vessels were most needed, we were limited to such tonnage as this coast supplied, and this coast had few lines of passenger ships to be drawn upon. Our passenger facilities, therefore, were mostly improvised.

The standard of the fittings of these ships for comfort and sanitation has always been the highest. Cleanliness received the best attention. No deviation is allowed from requirements in this respect. The idea of the comfort of the men and the sanitation of their quarters is kept prominently in mind in the refit of vessels designed for troop service. Shower baths are provided in numbers, located together, so as to constitute a sort of department of the ship of itself, and no man, no matter how many may be on board, need go without his daily bath. Special sanitary pumps are installed, which make an abundance of water available at all points. Such is the effectiveness of the measures taken with this object in view that the healthfulness of the ships has never been questioned, the conditions on board being such that there is a marked improvement generally in the health of those who in any way become subject to them.

To insure attention to and compliance with the requirements of the regulations respecting personal cleanliness, the ventilation of quarters, etc., it is prescribed that two regular inspections of all quarters each day shall be made by the commanding officer, the ship's master, the transport quartermaster, and the surgeon, and all reports show, even nonofficial mention of the condition of the ships, that scrupulous order and cleanliness distinguish the vessels in our fleet.

Under the impulsion of rapidly accumulating business the temptation has at times been strong to crowd the ships with men, after the manner permitted in moving military forces in other countries, but no deviation from our standard was ever made. The British navy, in fitting ships for the transportation of troops, allow but 70 to 77 cubic feet of space for air to the man. Our standard has always been 100 cubic feet, as a minimum, and from that up to 120 cubic feet. As a further instance of this, the transport Warren, under her former name the Scandia, was at one time in transport service for the Russian Government, at which time she carried 2,400 men. When taken into our service she was fitted up for 1,100 men, thus making ample allowance, and insuring the troops comfortable accomodations.

An important department of our well-equipped troopships is that charged with the provisioning of the passengers. Down in the depths of these big ships is always an enormous supply of provisions—sufficient, no matter what the emergency. In connection with the engine room, as an auxiliary, there is installed a powerful refrigerating and ice-making plant, used for the purpose of cooling the water supplied from sea water by the distiller and of reducing the temperature of, so as to preserve in their freshness, meats and vegetables on board ship. Under this reduced temperature the meats are kept, from which they come up fresh and inviting even after the vessel has entered equatorial regions, to be carved and cut into steaks and roasts for the officers and enlisted men.

Of a different nature is the question of hospital facilities on ships. The exclusive hospital ship was recommended and constructed, but the service has not shown this to be a justified expenditure, particularly on this coast. It is found that a hospital for a few patients in each of the regular ships is productive of better results. Life on a ship full of patients at various stages of helplessness and hopelessness is not pleasant to contemplate, and would not seem to be of itself very favorable to the improvement and recuperation of those so transported. For instance, the Missouri, an exclusive hospital ship, on the only passage from Manila made by a ship of that class of service, carrying sick, having on board 272 patients, reported on arrival 22 deaths en route.

The Grant, with small hospital accommodations, making the homeward passage at about the same season of the year, carried 275 patients, and on arrival reported 4 deaths en route. Furthermore, the service has not required an exclusive ship for patients. A proper service of this kind from the Philippines could not be organized, as it would take too many ships. The medical department at Manila could not entertain the idea of only being able to send patients home once in three months—exactly the prospect before it with one ship at its disposal. Consequently, when the hospital ship Missouri, elaborately fitted as she was, appeared as an addition to the Pacific fleet, she was immediately condemned, so far as hospital service was concerned, and the regular ships were equipped to enable the transportation of the Army's sick at the schedule passage.

It is unnecessary to revert to the familiar story of the acquisition of the Missouri by the War Department, replete as it is with suggestions of patriotic benevolence. The vessel had had from her second voyage a wonderful career as a life saver, incidentally, and her owner had acquired a sort of sentiment with regard to her in this respect, and she was practically fitted up for the service as an unofficial enterprise, the fittings being donated by private citizens. The high state of equipment of this ship, which was beautiful and elegant beyond precedent or parallel in the history of hospital ships, was an instance of individual generosity that is notable.

There was an ice-making machine and a refrigerating plant, a steam laundry, a carbonating apparatus, a large steam disinfector, two steam launches, electric fans, a complete telephone system, an enormous supply of suitable clothing and delicacies for the sick, an X-ray apparatus, four complete and perfectly equipped electrical diet or ward kitchens, a commodious operating room, a dispensary, a heating apparatus furnishing steam heat to every room, baths of fresh and salt water, hot and cold, there were elevators to carry patients from deck to deck, a dark room for developing negatives, and a library of 10,000 volumes, all supplied to the ship, dedicated to the Red Cross Society, the Government, and the purposes the ship was designed to subserve. But notwithstanding the resplendent fittings, the cozy rooms, and the sweet, white wards, the expenditure was found to be a mistaken one when put to a practical test.

The same signal success has attended the transportation of cavalry horses. With the exception of the two disasters that befell animal ships through their being caught in typhoons, nearly demolishing the vessels themselves, stock has invariably been landed in good condition, and in fact with less loss than occurred in their shipment overland from the points at which they were assembled. In one case, that of the only sailing ship employed, the Tacoma, not only was there no loss en route, but the ship arrived with one animal more than the number with which she went to sea.

I have merely discussed the transport service with reference to its evolution from the point when it becomes a public necessity and with reference to the measures taken to produce the gratifying consummation of its doings to date. What the service may in the future become can be very correctly inferred, I believe. At least no necessity for material alteration has become apparent. The course it has taken in the past has been largely contingent upon the circumstances under which it had to proceed and to operate. It might, however, have taken an entirely different course in the past had experience suggested it.

Not so in the future. For the solutions of most future questions there will be found precedents, and the course hereafter to be taken will be considered and determined with reference to the records made. All projects must now be considered with reference to the existing establishment and organization. However, its position is not apt to remain unassailed. In the East the service was absorbed by the strongly centralized commercial interests, who saw it performing on a mere utility basis work that, could it be got out of the way, could easily be made productive of profit and boot.

Commercial interests are not so well organized here, however, and the task of dissolving the Army transport service establishment on this coast is a larger one, and probably not an easier one. The service in practice has found itself provided with strong arguments against a contract service. It has seen the elimination of the chartered vessel, which has proved a troublesome auxiliary, and has lain the service open to the only assaults ever made upon it. It has seen the results of an attempt to maintain an establishment only partially or not at all under control.

It has shown that to be productive of unimpeachable results and for the security of the life and health of the soldier, as well as from the study of his comfort, it should be as far as possible removed from considerations of "cheese-paring and candle-end" economy. On the other hand, the grounds on which the mercantile interests could hope to abolish the service would not appear to be indefeasible. The placing of this vast business with a commercial firm for the purpose of fostering trade relations with the islands would not likely produce the desired result.

There is at present no trade of sufficient bulk to warrant any company in engaging in it. Conditions do not exist to render it profitable. To promote such an undertaking a Government subsidy is sought in the guise of patronage, it being known that the merchants' exchanges of this city has taken the initial step in this direction. Such subsidy would place the fortunate firm beyond the necessity of commercial support and beyond the constraint of competition. Any remarkable impetus to industry in the islands as an outgrowth of the establishment of a commercial line of ships on such a basis as would render it independent of patronage of the individual shipper and disincline it to meet him on any favorably terms, does not necessarily follow.

It may be also mentioned that the work which the transport service has been called upon to do has been largely of the rush order, which made economy in fitting impossible from the fact that night, day, and Sunday work became necessary at enormously increased cost, and since emergencies can not be foreseen it would be impossible to so estimate as to intelligently contract for such work alike in justice to the Government and the contractor.

Such a line, fostered and maintained by Government patronage, would be productive of scandal and be a reproach in the public mind and the press. Having devoted my life to commerce, to shipping, and the sea, I am inclined to be partial to the commercial view of all questions with almost a partisan interest. This accounts, if not for the conclusion, at least for the definiteness of my views.

Considering the work to be accomplished and the public interest in the manner of its performance, I believe that a commercially conducted transport service is no more to be thought of than a contract commissary for the entire Army. Should the Government abolish the present service and let out by contract the transport business to the Philippines, it will thereby create an absolute monopoly also on all other transportation of passengers and freight on that route, render competitive bidding impossible, and raise an even greater question in the necessity of disposing of its present appliances for the service.

But whatever attack the transport service may ever be called upon to meet, it can never suffer and its friends can never be disconcerted by any reference to its record.

I inclose a brief recapitulation of the work performed from the initiation of the transport service up to and including June 30, 1901. I also inclose, marked "Table 2," a list of the chartered ships, with date of engagement and discharge and rate of pay. In this connection a comparison of our transport service with that of the British in connection with their recent movement of troops from England and Australia to South Africa may be of interest.

It is almost unnecessary for me to point out that where we had one vessel under the American flag, or even of any nationality, on the Pacific coast available for charter, the British Government had at least 100, and from the magnificent fleet of first-class liners sailing under the British flag could be chosen many ships which, from the nature of their employment as emigrant and passenger ships, required little changing to adapt them as first-class troop ships.

This immense fleet also gave the British Government the advantage of competition in rates of charter which, from the restricted nature of the fleet at hand on our coast, was not possible with our Government. Nevertheless I may point out—and it speaks well for the business-like methods of our service—we were enabled to charter our vessels at practically the same rates as those paid by the British Government.

During a recent vacation, and while on a visit to Sydney, Australia, I had an opportunity of inspecting the British chartered troop ship Orient, an iron single-screw steamer of 5,365 tons gross register, built in 1879. This vessel had been continuously under charter to the British Government for a period of about two years, at a rate of 22 shillings per gross register ton per month, Government form of time charter—conditions practically the same as those under which ships were chartered by our Quartermaster's Department.

This rate figures out $28,681 per month. The owners of the ship provide for the messing of the troops and officers carried, being allowed about 75 cents per day for a man and $1.50 per day for officers. The men were carried in hammocks and messed in the same quarters in which they slept. I made a very careful inspection of this vessel, and there was absolutely no comparison between the manner in which our troops are transported, from point of comfort, and the manner in which the men carried on this vessel were looked after, our service being so far ahead in point of hospital, sanitary, and, in fact, every other facility that it was beyond comparison—superior in every respect.

I ascertained that this vessel had on frequent occasions been held in port for six weeks, practically idle, and on full pay; and as this question of delay has been a point from which our service has been criticised, I draw particular attention to this as showing that it is not always possible to land troops and their supplies in times of war as promptly as the passengers and freight of an ordinary commercial liner are handled in times of peace, and we are certainly more free from censure in point of delay than the British service would be in this respect.

When it is taken into consideration that it costs about 40 per cent more to operate a vessel under the American flag, carrying the crew called for by United States Treasury Regulations, and paying them the wages current on the Pacific coast, I claim that the vessels chartered by our Government for troops were not any more expensive (if as expensive) as during the present African war of vessels to the British Government; and it should be further borne in mind that at the time we were calling for vessels the ordinary commerce of the Pacific coast had received a tremendous impetus, freights were high in every direction, and it was easy for shipowners to obtain profitable employment along any lines for any tonnage they might have.

While our service has been free from loss, except in two instances of animal ships losing their animals, previously mentioned, through typhoons, and one chartered vessel which was lost in the inland sea, thereby causing a loss of freight only, in the British transport service a number of vessels have been lost, and several have put back after starting; also various delays have occurred—some through improper loading, some through ships going out poorly equipped at the outset. Nothing of this nature can be charged against our transport service here, which has never had a vessel return to port through negligence on the part of any of the officials of the service during its entire history.

This short sketch of the service, brief as it is, would not be complete without directing attention to the enormous amount of work and responsibility which devolved upon the general superintendent, Brig. Gen. O. F. Long, United States Army. This officer has been untiring in his efforts, conscientious in his dealings, and has done his duty most thoroughly and with rare good judgment. The result of his work and the work of the service is certainly a credit to the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army, and stands up favorably compared with that of Great Britain, recognized as the foremost among nations in maritime matters.

JOHN BARNESON,
Marine Superintendent, A. T. S.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DALZELL having assumed the Chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BOUTELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the Army appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

REBATE OF DUTIES ON COAL.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16649) to provide rebate of duties on coal.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to make full rebate of duties imposed by law on all coal of every form and description imported into the United States from foreign countries for the period of one year from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose the bill will go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. I want to give notice that I will endeavor to get consideration of the bill as early in the day to-morrow as possible.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and printed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BOUTELL in the chair.

Mr. HULL. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will use some of his time.

Mr. HAY. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to discuss the pending measure, making appropriations for the Army—they will come as a matter of course—but rather to present to this House for a few moments the consideration of questions of order, of law, and of decent administration in this House, and the right of the people who live on that part of the public domain bounded by the great Commonwealths of Texas, Kansas, Arkansas, and Missouri, and the Territory of Oklahoma to the right of self-government—a right enjoyed by all of the organized Territories inside of the old Union; a right enjoyed by all the States, and yet denied to the people of this particular Territory; a right not even denied to the people of the Hawaiian Islands (our recent possession), and yet we find within this fertile Territory a state of affairs scarcely any better than those existing in the Philippines, Guam, or Porto Rico. Why is it so? Have the people not appealed to this House for a remedy for this condition? Are they not prepared for a Territorial form of government?

There is a Territory unorganized, inhabited by nearly half a million of American citizens—four hundred and odd thousands—former citizens of the different Commonwealths of this Union; there are 150,000 children growing up in ignorance; there are a people with $60,000,000 of taxable values, not counting the annual agricultural products and 250,000 cattle that roam upon their fields. They have appealed, and appealed in vain, to this House for a remedy for this most anomalous condition existing in the very heart of this great Republic. Nearly every newspaper of both parties, every political organization in 70 towns, every private organization, various mass conventions of these people, have appealed to this House and asked for some measure of government; not for statehood, but merely for a Territorial form of government, that life, liberty, and property may be protected in that great domain; and yet that appeal has been unavailing, so far as the action of this House is concerned.

The Committee on the Territories, to whom was referred a bill to create out of this Territory the Territory of Jefferson and establish a temporary government therefor, reported to this House in March last, unanimously, the bill, recommending its passage. The Speaker of this House suppressed the right to hear this bill. I now come to speak to this House, not especially upon the merits of this measure, but upon that rule, that condition of things existing in this House, by which one man may deny to 500,000 people the right to good order and peace and self-government at his own will and caprice.

Mr. Chairman, I know that these objections are often futile. I know that the majority party, under our Constitution, in this House has the right, as it ought to have the right, to rule; but no party has the right to abdicate its own power and abdicate that of the minority and its rights upon this floor and place it, dangerously place it, in the hands of any Speaker.

Calmly and dispassionately, for a moment, look at the situation in this House and see, if we can, why it is that these people, entitled to this redress, entitled to this legal government, have not been heard. You may deny relief, but you can not justly deny a hearing. Under the rules of this House every bill of a private nature goes to that Calendar designated by this body as the Private Calendar. There are days fixed upon which bills upon that Calendar can be heard in their regular order. Every bill introduced into this House of a public nature, that does not make an appropriation nor raise revenue nor dispose of public property, goes to another Calendar, known as the House Calendar. That Calendar, under the rules of this House, is subject to a call by committees, each committee of this House having the right under the order of business to take up measures on that Calendar. Therefore, measures there may be heard in decency and in order as they are heard on the Private Calendar.

But what of that other Calendar, where every public measure making an appropriation, raising revenue, or disposing of the public property is placed? Why should there be no time fixed for the hearing of that Calendar? Why is it that in seven years gone past but once has that Calendar been called in this House? Under the rules of this House any member has a right, after the morning hour, to rise in his place and move that the House go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of that Calendar or any bill upon it. Yet how is this right thwarted, and for what purpose? Unless you have first subjected yourself to the humiliating condition of asking the Speaker to recognize you—a condition that any man who possesses the instinct of an ordinary gentleman ought to abhor in this House—you, Mr. Chairman, shall demand the right from the Speaker to be recognized to make such a motion, you rise in vain here.

The Speaker will ask, For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee, or the gentleman from Georgia, or the gentleman from Maine rise? If it be announced, For the purpose of making a motion that we go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider measures on the Union Calendar, or a particular bill thereon, he will calmly say to you, "The Speaker does not recognize the gentleman for that purpose." You have not obtained consent before; you could not obtain it; it is under his control. Unanimous consent can be obtained only by first obtaining consent of the Speaker to make the motion for the present consideration of the bill by unanimous consent. Thus the power of this House is closed and in the hands of the Speaker. There is one other remedy, ineffectual except under the will of the Speaker, and that is to offer a resolution for consideration, at a particular turn of a bill, by this House, which goes to the Committee on Rules, and they may determine whether the bill designated shall be taken from the Calendar and considered subject to the approval of the House.

Why is it, Mr. Chairman, that the Calendar upon which four-fifths of the important measures in this House is placed shall be held under the direct control and subjection of the Speaker, or the Committee on Rules, of which the Speaker is Chairman? What is the purpose of it? What is the object to be accomplished? Why not proceed with these cases as with others? I would not assume that there was any wrong or improper motive in it. I can not conceive that any party for partisan purposes would desire the control of that Calendar in that way. How dangerous a thing it is. The day might come in the history of this country when a man would sit in the Speaker's chair and when members of the Committee on Rules might not be honest men. If such an unfortunate condition were to come, how dangerous would be the affairs of our country, for if private interests under such circumstances could not be recognized and control over the public weal and welfare, there are no conditions under which it could be done. It is the open door of corruption. It is wrong to the country. It is a bad system of legislation. It is unpatriotic for this House to give away its power in this way. All of the people's Representatives are thus forced by the majority to yield their power to the Speaker.

Now, what remedy have we? Why this protest alone? How futile it is. We have heard it made before. A protest, sir, unaccompanied by some work, will be in vain. I have no objection to the consideration of any business in this House that is done orderly. I have no objection to the manner in which this Private Calendar is disposed of, or the House Calendar. But I shall protest against the consideration of any bill on the Union Calendar taken up by the will and consent of the Speaker, out of its order and against my will, or that of other members of this House.

What right has that Speaker to displace a bill placed on the Calendar more than a year ago in favor of one placed there but a week ago? Why should this House give to him the right to recognize his favorites, either personal or political, for the consideration of a measure when he will not grant recognition to any gentleman presenting a measure that the Speaker, for any reason, thinks ought not to pass. Has it come to the point that this House must be judged to have less sense, less honor, less conscience, and less integrity than the man they place in the Speaker's chair, as its servant?

The action of the Speaker of the House in refusing to the Committee on Territories the consideration of the bill mentioned, to create the Territory of Jefferson and establish a temporary government therefor, is without precedent under the conditions, it being a unanimous report and affecting the rights of the people of a Territory as big as the great State of Maine. It is a contempt of that committee. Directed by that committee to use such means as I can on this floor to obtain the consideration of that bill, I have appealed to the Speaker in vain. Other members have appealed to him in vain. Resolutions have been offered that have gone to the Committee on Rules, and no action taken. I know not the potency of an influence that will so control a Speaker—I know not the reasons for an influence of that sort—when it has been demonstrated on this floor in the speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], and documents contained in the appendix thereto, that the whole Territory is in favor of the measure. Shall half a million of people be denied a hearing in this House at the will of the Speaker? Shall the Committee on Territories be treated with contempt when they appeal to him for the rights of membership? Shall he destroy the equality of membership in this House at his will?

Upon a proper construction of the rules of this House, the Speaker of the House, in my judgment, has no such power as that which he assumes and arrogates to himself. I propose to protest against the further exercise of that power. He shall not, by unanimous consent, take from this Union Calendar, from this hour on, a single bill of less importance than the one I have referred to, nor yet a bill that has been reported to this House after that bill was reported and placed on this Calendar.

Whatever this House may do in its judgment, we would most cheerfully, of course, acquiesce in; but the end of unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, has come—not to gratify any spirit of retaliation; but, in my judgment, all things should be done orderly and decently in this House. Let us live by the law we have written. In behalf of good legislation, in the name of honest legislation, I resist the subversion of the power of this House and its assumption by the Speaker; and on this floor I propose to use all the reserved power and right of a Representative to thwart the will of the Speaker in this cowardly undertaking. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CAPRON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries, who informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On January 10, 1903:

H. R. 15605. An act to authorize and empower the Southwest Louisiana Rice Growers' Association, of the State of Louisiana, to construct a lock or locks and a dam in Bayou Vermilion, in the State of Louisiana; and

H. R. 15606. An act to authorize and empower the Rice Irrigation and Improvement Association of the State of Louisiana to construct a lock or locks and a dam in Mermentau River, in the State of Louisiana.

On January 12, 1903:

H. R. 13468. An act granting an increase of pension to Joseph S. Mess; and

H. R. 11093. An act granting an increase of pension to Nannie M. Kimberly.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HULL (chairman Committee on Military Affairs). If there be no objection on the other side, I will now give twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC].

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose in the observations I desire to address to this House to either offensively arraign the policy of the opposition or fulsomely eulogize the acts of the majority, but I must necessarily contrast the sagacity and success of our conduct of affairs in the Philippine Islands with the substitutes offered and the predictions made by the other side.

The indorsement by the people at the recent elections in which our policy in the Philippine Islands was made the leading issue in the Democratic campaign book, or which at least was given the conspicuous place of honor in that book by its compiler, the junior Senator from Tennessee, chairman of the Democratic Congressional committee on literature, leaves but little to be said on the question of expansion.

A fatality which I shall never regret, Mr. Chairman, uncovered my native modesty and changed my silent contemplation into an exchange of views with the most conspicuous champion of the armed enemies of the Republic. Under the unjustifiable deductive title of "Anti-Imperialist" this imperious person selected my obscure and unassuming self to point out his moral and adorn his tale. The House is in possession of, and indeed the whole country is acquainted with the facts in the controversy between Edward Atkinson, author of the "Science of Nutrition"—the inventor of the Aladdin oven, the patentee of the workingman's dinner pail, and "That man SHATTUC."

It is not my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to enlighten the House or the country with either suppressed or new developments in that personal controversy that I arise to place in the record of these proceedings my attestation of the wisdom of our administrative policy in the Philippine Islands, but incidentally to photograph on the minds of the present and the rising generation the treasonable, and especially the dangerously economic theories, teachings, and utterances of one Edward Atkinson; and I am profoundly grateful that there is but one of his kind who has, with mathematical details, demonstrated to be theoretically true that an American workingman can live on 11 cents per diem by following the menus he prescribes in his "Science of Nutrition," using his Aladdin oven for cooking the food, and his patent dinner pail to carry it to the shop, factory, or mill, the price of coal cutting no figure, low or high, in these calculations.

Let us contemplate, Mr. Chairman, the revolution he would create as a scientist of nutrition before I refer to his monumental failure as a political scientist. An intellectual monstrosity might alone reconcile the cavity of his cranium devoted to the tanking of gray matter to a harmonious existence of these two separate and distinct elements, for even the most unsophisticated soon learn the sad lesson that nutrition and politics will not mix, for as the one inevitably leads to contentment and longevity, the other just as surely claims an early and broken-down victim of an ungrateful constituency, as some of my colleagues on either side of the Chamber discovered in the ides of November last.

To proceed, then, Mr. Chairman, with the Mr. Hyde division of the Atkinson duality, it is known, for he himself has written it, that he devoted the larger part of a misspent existence in a scientific investigation of the quantities and qualities of food necessary to support human life, independent of the cravings of hunger and the depraved appetites of mankind—especially the working classes—uninstructed but natural gluttons, who eat until they are full in times of Republican prosperity and whose untrained and natural appetites this philosopher and friend sets himself down in his æsthetic study in Brookline, Mass., to educate and correct. He discovered early in his investigation into this important science that even infants violated its elementary principles, except those brought up on the bottle and who are fed on embalmed milk. He confines his dietetic regimen entirely to adults, as he inferentially acknowledges that it would be utterly useless to appeal to the infants themselves, inasmuch as a vast majority of them can neither read, write, nor speak the language of their parents.

The food consumed by adults, however, in excess of their needs is to him a constant and unvarying subject of undisguised amazement. He has camped at the noon hour in the midst of brawny laborers and watched them, as Gulliver watched the Brobdignagians, with horror, amounting to paralysis, consume their noonday meals of meat, bread, coffee, pies, and other injurious and unnecessary solids and liquids, and found his heart touched with pity at their semisavage ignorance of the science of nutrition. Hence he applied himself, firstly, to the invention of a dinner pail with proper hygienic environments, and, secondly, to an oven which would cook the food necessary for the nutrition of the workingman.

I desire right here, Mr. Chairman, to mark my approval of the subject he selected for experiment when the lamp and the dinner pail were created by his inventive genius, and that subject was—himself.

The experiment now going on under a professor in the Agricultural Department is distinguished from that conducted by the author of the "Science of Nutrition" in that the latter experimented on his own digestive organs, while the Government scientist has selected a dozen victims from the ranks of the lower-grade clerks. And, again, the author of the "Science of Nutrition" conducted his experiment with a view to the discovery of the least quantity of food necessary to sustain life in the workingman, while the Government investigator has started out to ascertain the full extent of the abilities of a low-grade clerk to digest enormous quantities of embalmed, adulterated, and prepared food without any reference to their nutritive qualities, but, on the contrary, Mr. Chairman, with perhaps an apprehensive and expectant view that the experiment may result in the elimination of the victims from the Government service before the conclusion of the time limit, either by desertion, surfeit, or translation to a better world, where the menus are more nearly on a plane with that of the author of the "Science of Nutrition."

I understand, from an unofficial source, that the Government professor conducting the experiment referred to is animated by the entirely laudable motive that if anybody's life or health must pay the forfeit of eating adulterated foods, no more appropriate or unmourned sacrifice could be offered or selected for the benefit of humanity than the low-grade Government clerk. But to return to the author of the "Science of Nutrition." He tells us that for one week he lived on the bill of fare which he publishes with a fancy border, in leaded, black-faced type, and that he found the nutrition not only amply sufficient, but an absolute tonic to the system.

The raw food for the entire week cost less than 80 cents, and, including the fuel for his oven, together with his own services as cook and dishwasher, he triumphantly proclaimed that the entire outlay did not exceed $1. Thereupon he gave his remarkable discovery to the world free of cost, but patented his oven, which he had named "The Aladdin," and his hygienic dinner pail, which he called the workingman's—after himself. Through lectures at first, and subsequently through canvasbacked brochures, he made many theoretical converts to his views on nutrition, but it was noticeable, as it was significant, that the converts were not of the toiling class, but were exclusively of the short-haired women and the long-haired men variety. [Laughter.]

Strange and inexplicable as it may appear, the very class for whom he burned the midnight oil in his Aladdin lamp hooted and frowned when he insisted that they could and ought to live on $1 per week, and that nutritious food, cooked in his patented Aladdin oven, could be purchased for 11 cents per diem. He showed them how a meat bone costing 3 cents would make a pail of soup, which, with 2 cents for bread, would make a nutritious dinner, and that this bone could be warmed over for supper and its shreds of meat used the next morning for breakfast, the remaining 6 cents to be devoted to the purchase of luxuries, such as hog's lard for butter and kindred delicacies, including the great national food of the Chinese—split rice.

Will the House indulge me for a few moments' contemplation of my mind's eye to retrospectively gaze on that silent figure in his kitchen—laboratory—sleeves rolled up, with apron and paper cap on, and his Aladdin oven stewing a 3-cent meat bone in his workingman's dinner pail, benignantly picturing to himself the solution of the labor problem and the creation of a race of toilers whose nutritious wants will be so simple that any kind of wages will amply suffice? There will be no more coal strikes, and there will be little demand even for coal as a fuel for cooking purposes. The Aladdin oven will do the little cooking required and the workingman's dinner pail will hold all the food necessary for nutrition.

Heavenly twins, indeed, this Aladdin oven and the workingman's dinner pail! And, Mr. Chairman, my eyes are hot to see the day—the millennium day—when each Representative to Congress will be required to present himself for service to his constituents here, Aladdin oven and workingman's dinner pail in hand, containing a large, juicy, 3-cent meat bone for his proper nutrition. Why not, I say? Scoffers whose premonitions of gout prompt their skepticism are admonished that the great author of this "Science of Nutrition." experimented for a whole week on the menu mentioned, and lived, Mr. Chairman, lived, sir, to organize the Anti-Imperialist League and find his system toned, his stomach relieved, and his digestion equal to that of the pot-bellied bolomen of his great and good friend Aguinaldo. The deduction is irrefutable that if, as has been theoretically laid down by this scientist, a man digging coal, employed in a rolling mill, or carrying a hod can find sufficient nutrition in a 3-cent meat bone, 2 cents' worth of stale bread, and a respectable piece of hog's lard, and who works eight to ten hours a day, a Representative in Congress, whose entire manual labor consists in walking up the steps of the Capitol and drawing his salary, can also fatten and thrive upon this scientifically demonstrated sufficiency, in addition, of course, to the natural self-sufficiency inherent in members of Congress. [Applause.]

I have been led, Mr. Chairman, into a thorough and exhaustive study of this "Science of Nutrition" by reason of the fortunate fatality I have referred to up to the memorable day that the country rocked with the echo of this great scientist's inquiry, "Who is this man SHATTUC?" I was quietly plodding along, gaining undesirable flesh, growing a full beard, and inviting the gout by my gross ignorance of the "Science of Nutrition." I enjoyed no other relaxation or amusement than this House afforded me in the counters, encounters, and gyrations of the overloaded intellects of either side. Indeed, but for such variations in the monotony of existence, incidental to statesmanship, I should have been overcome by the stupor of a large private business, and in that doped condition have probably raised the rents on my tenants. I have been, Mr. Chairman, long enough here for the members of this House to know me on sight, but recently I have found it necessary to reintroduce myself to several unobservant colleagues, who apparently overlooked the gradual change or transformation in my personal appearance.

To the study of this fascinating "Science of Nutrition" is entirely due the change in my facial adornment. My reduced weight, elastic step, and now beaming eye were acquired by using a single bottle of this great scientific discovery, which, but for the inquiry of its discoverer, would have remained to me a sealed book. When I had fully realized that an answer to the Atkinson inquiry was breathlessly awaited by this country and the island of Luzon, I threw off the spell or lethargy with which the orations of the then Representative of the Ohio capital district had ensnared or hypnotized me, and for the first time in my life inwardly acknowledged that I was up against it. [Applause.]

Of course, Mr. Chairman, I knew who "this man SHATTUC" was, but who he was going to be after the "thunder in the index" of the great leader of the anti-imperialists sweated my night robe? I compromised my perturbation of mind by a resolution—the first I had formulated since my election—to ascertain who this man Atkinson could be, and in the natural order of Congressional investigation I laid the solution of the problem aside for a few months. Meanwhile some private correspondence with the anti-imperialist leader (which satisfied the public mind) got into the newspapers, and I might here observe, Mr. Chairman, that it is because this correspondence is now in a bound volume in the archives of the Congressional Library that I have claimed the privilege of the floor and the indulgence of the House to notice the author and the book. It is proper to state that the book in question is the Anti-Imperialist, containing five issues of that "busted" publication, bound in red cloth, with the author's name—Edward Atkinson—in gold letters. Later on, I shall refer to the contents of the volume, but for the present I will proceed with the result of that investigation to which I am indebted for increased serenity of mind and decreased girth of body. [Applause.]

I mentioned the Congressional Library. In that depository of the intellectual offsprings of the master minds of this age and country and other ages and other countries I found the catalogued name of Edward Atkinson, author of the "Science of Nutrition." My early Greek having been shot out of me in the civil war, I did not shout, "Eureka!" when the volume was placed in my hands, but I am informed by friends from Massachusetts that Atkinson did when he read the answer to his famous interrogatory in my brief but explanatory response in this House. That rare, unique, and precious volume, the "Science of Nutrition," has been a solace, a comfort, a cure, and an appetizer to me since I first had it placed in my hands and perused its pages, devoured and digested the menus in fancy borders adorning and illuminating, as it were, the literary and persuasive logic of its great author.

It has been my custom, Mr. Chairman, to meander to the Library, both on my arrival here at each session of Congress and at intervals during the session, to peruse this book. When the appetite is cloyed and when digestion taps its warnings, I find speedy relief by reading the soup-bone dietary for workingmen. Fondly—indeed, I may add enthusiastically—gazing at the half-tone engravings of the Aladdin oven and the workingman's dinner pail, which illustrate the text, I have experienced the most indescribable longings for soup bones and stale bread, cooked in the Aladdin oven and packed away in this patent dinner pail. But alas! There is no such thing as continuous happiness, even gluttonous pleasure, on this earth. [Applause.]

On my recent arrival I hastened with springy footsteps and fond anticipation to the Library for my customary feast of reason and flow of soup bone, and behold the book was gone! Every unemployed supernumerary was immediately set to work to trace the book. It had not been given out. There was no record of any person being intrusted with it. The employees did everything their humanity prompted to console me. A more elaborate search would be conducted until the book was found. Meantime other volumes by other authors on nutrition were offered me, but were indignantly and speechlessly refused. I wanted only Atkinson's "Science of Nutrition" and Aladdin oven and the patented dinner pail. Finally the red-bound volume of the anti-imperialist was placed in front of me, and I listlessly opened it at the preface.

I became interested in the pathetic acknowledgment by the author that the publication suspended after the issuance of its fifth number. It was this fifth and last number that interested me. The issue was in German and in English. I read the English text, and lo and behold! Mr. Chairman, I discovered that I was the hero, or rather the heavy villain, of the tale and that Atkinson was the author. And hence these remarks and all that follows. In this number devoted to myself he makes an appeal for extra funds to the anti-imperialists of the country, because, as he says:

> This edition, with an addenda in the German language for special use in the First district of Ohio, has been very expensive.

And he adds:

> Subscriptions from $10 to $500 will be gratefully received to keep up the good work.

He concludes an exhaustive appeal to the "opponents of criminal aggression in the First district of Ohio" with these solemn words:

> I never have met or heard of W. B. SHATTUC before.

That he has since heard of me he evidences further along by the publication of our personal correspondence, with a prefatory introduction to his readers. The German language is used to acquaint his readers of the First Ohio district with the astounding information that as a Republican I am supporting the Republican Administration, and that I am a champion "of criminal aggression." Whereupon the qualified voters of the First Ohio district reelected me to Congress, and the anti-imperialist gives up the ghost. This was two years ago, Mr. Chairman, and up to my recent visit to the Library I was blissfully oblivious of the astounding fact that the author of the "Science of Nutrition" was receiving from $10 to $500 subscriptions for the circulation of literature in my district.

But passing for a moment the personal phase of this extraordinary antagonism, which I seemed to have aroused in the philanthrophic heart of the author of the "Science of Nutrition," I desire to make a few quotations of a general character from his now defunct and unlamented publication. He announces the three divisions of his little red book thusly:

"No. 1. The Cost of a National Crime. Price, 10 cents.

"No. 2. The Hell of War. Price, 10 cents.

"No. 3. Criminal aggression. By whom committed. Price 10 cents." It is fully worth double the money to find out the perpetrators.

The first is dedicated to President Roosevelt. The author states that he is solely responsible for the war in the Philippines, in proof of which he quotes the first dispatch sent to Admiral Dewey by Assistant Secretary of the Navy Theodore Roosevelt. In that dispatch, dated February 25, 1898, the instructions are given the Admiral to be on the alert for the first declaration of war with Spain and to "capture and hold the Philippine Islands." This is the way the scientist puts it, but the order was to capture or destroy the Spanish navy. However, I will not split hairs on this point with the inventor of Aladdin oven and only notice the statement to particularize the fact that to the foresight and grasp of the true situation by the Assistant Secretary—Roosevelt—the country was indebted for the quick ending of the war with Spain.

In commenting on the action resultant from the Assistant Secretary's dispatch, the author of the "Science of Nutrition," says:

I claim no more foresight than any other man of common sense.

And then he predicts:

We may soon witness the evacuation of the Philippine Islands by our troops.

He said that two years ago.

If the hind sight of the inventor of the Aladdin oven was utilized instead of his foresight, he might have predicted differently and certainly more accurately for the truth of history. The following paragraph will shed some light on the once formidable and noisy anti-imperialists' organization. The patentee of the workingman's dinner pail says:

It has been expedient for me to print and publish the Anti-Imperialist upon my own responsibility.

And then he goes on to tell why. Mark his significant admission of infallibility:

I am obliged to treat the tariff and the currency from a point of view in which many members of the Anti-Imperialist League might not concur. This difference has led to a very wide personal correspondence, partly directed to me. Some thousands of letters have been received from every part of the country, but these views are ex parte and one sided.

Hence he dismisses the remonstrances and views of these thousands and characterizes them as one sided, etc., much after the manner of the lone juror who disagreed with his eleven obstinate brethren. But he does not reach in this egotistical pronunciamento his full altitude, for in anathematizing the Republican policy of expansion he says:

As I with a few others created this Republican party, so will I destroy it and create another political party in its place to perform—

His sweet will, it is supposed.

He rises, however, to the sublime heights of unconscious impudence when he thus addresses the workingmen, for whose express benefit he studied the science of nutrition and discovered the soup-bone dietary. He says:

Workingmen, how long will you bear an additional tax, which now amounts to $15 per family per annum, to support this war of criminal aggression?

Why, on this extra tax a workingman could live three calendar months by using the Aladdin oven and confining himself to the Atkinson menu for adult toilers. After fruitless and agonizing appeals for funds to run the Anti-Imperialist the author of the "Science of Nutrition" utters this despairing howl. He says:

I shall again advance the money for the composition and electrotyping the plates. Subscribers are requested to send orders and mailing cards at $5 per hundred without, and $7 per hundred with postage; single copies, 10 cents.

Having tried every method known to the chromo advertiser, he made a final appeal for the chain-letter style of circulating the sheet. This, too, failing, and having exhausted himself in the final edition devoted to my district, in two languages, he laid down, after penning this valedictory to his readers, who had by this time evidently taken to the woods. Hear him, Mr. Chairman, for his cause:

We can make the Philippine Islands the sanctuary of commerce, we can aid the inhabitants to bring order out of chaos, we can help them work out their own national salvation, and, joined with the Czar, we can take the first measures for abating the hell of war upon earth.

Then with his eyes "a fine frenzy rolling," the author of the "Science of Nutrition" and the inventor of the Aladdin oven, sings, thusly:

Can these things come to pass?
Nay, if it be, alas, a vision!
Still let us sleep, and dream it's true.

To which I may be permitted to reply in all sincerity:

Sleep on, entranced with soup-bone dreams, nor wake,
But please stay dead, for your country's sake.

Mr. Chairman, I inferentially expressed qualified gratitude and approval to the author of the "Science of Nutrition" for the Aladdin oven and the soup-bone menu because of the benefits they have been to myself, individually, as an inciter to a sometimes fagged appetite, and I only mildly questioned the application of his theories to the workingman who toils for his living with his hands. For this class the Republican full dinner bucket and the Republican scale of wages have my eternal support and undivided sympathy. It may, and no doubt is, conducive to both health and digestion for students of nutrition to read Atkinson's book on the advantages of soup-bone menus, and it would most assuredly be both serviceable and judicious to issue it as anti-imperialist literature to the Filipinos themselves instead of the inane and vapid howlings which "busted" the organ of that faction and reduced their numbers to a New England dinner party. Not only is their organ of this annex to the Democratic party "busted," but their organization, of which this man Atkinson was arch high priest and mouthpiece, gone to join the Populists in the happy hunting grounds of unmourned oblivion. [Laughter.]

The newspapers no longer find either organization a subject of even padded comment. The few survivors of the so-called anti-imperialists, still led by the author of the "Science of Nutrition," we are informed by the press, now meet but to mourn their fallen notoriety in annual banquets at so much per plate. From this it will be noted that this blatant anti-imperialist has returned to his first love—soup-bone menus for others—and that his ruling passion, if not his appetite, is still concentrated on the feeding hour, his treasonable agitation having slipped a cog in November last.

The only unpleasant episode of my Congressional service has been in being baited into personalities with this inflated and imperious person whose withering scorn and overpowering sarcasm were exhibited in the crushing expression of "Who is this man SHATTUC?"—to mark, no doubt, his contemptuous ignorance of the representatives of the people. [Laughter.] I wish to observe, with all proper humility, that to have served in the military and civil service of one's country, and to have been connected officially with one of its great public utilities for many years, do not suffice for an introduction to this lofty egotist, who glorifies his ingratitude for the service of our soldiers, who anathematizes the Government and Administration running counter to his imperial wishes, and who arrogantly asserts his purpose to destroy the party which he idiotically claims to have founded with the aid of a few subordinates.

I would say for the enlightenment of posterity that neither then nor now has he ever manifested any robust inclination to endanger his mortal parts in the maintenance of his convictions. His cold heart now as then never throbbed to the blare of trumpet or beat of war drum; even the wild and screaming fife, the clashing cymbals, and the deafening noise of tom-toms by the household guards of Aguinaldo found the tympanums of his classic ears "closed incidents." His immortal wind breaks forth alone in advocacy of his country's humiliation or in balky periods of alternate denunciation of its armed champions and its patriot statesmen. [Laughter.]

Appareled in the breechclout of anti-imperialism, his imperial intellect commands the machinery of the mightiest Republic in history to stop, while he adjusts the strings of his loin cloth and challenges the civilization of the Anglo-Saxon. This once overfed idealist, who, on an expenditure of 11 cents per diem for nutrition, reduced his gross materialistic body to the scientific solidity of a moving-picture, discovers that his ethereal spirit was impregnated with a miscarriage, and the puerile aggregation of kindred shadows whom he brought forth to halt the progress of the Republic have vanished "like the baseless fabric of a dream." Behold the author of the "Science of Nutrition," the inventor of the Aladdin oven and the workingman's foodless dinner pail, now alone the presiding genius of "melancholy festivity." To solemn banquets, Mr. Chairman, is, alas! reduced the Anti-Imperialist League, foundered if not founded by Edward Atkinson. Impotent to profane his country's sanctuary, baffled in his purposed treason, and deserted by even his Filipino tin god, this heretofore rushing, rumbling, tossing, maddening mouthpiece and cyclonic outlet of foul gas banquets in memoriam, with a few kindred has-beens, on the Lucullus menu prescribed in his "Science of Nutrition."

This curious freak of harmless agitation and dangerous philanthropist exaggerates in his intellectual makeup the most striking characteristic in the unbalanced human biped—self-importance. In the interval, for instance, between his founding of the Republican party and his foundering of the Anti-Imperialist League—more than half a century—he concentrated his centiped activities in an effort to defeat the purpose of an all-wise Providence by formulating a science, the salient feature of which is the substitution of imagination for natural appetite. The science of nutrition, as he defines it, if tried on the hopelessly insane or the irredeemable malefactor, would arouse the indignation of humanity; but with sardonic design, which refutes his philanthropy, he selects the toiler as the guinea pig of his experimental economy.

And while he offers the American workingman a future of soup bones and stale bread, with hog's lard as a delicacy, he appeals to the intelligence of his country to abandon to anarchy and the survival of the fittest the hapless and degraded victims whom the fortunes of war and, I believe, Mr. Chairman, the designs of Providence committed to our care. In one of those visionary trances from which he poetically requests us not to awaken him, he deifies the mongrel chief of these half-naked, swamp-infesting hordes into the likeness and attributes of the Godlike Washington, and endows the bolomen of Luzon with the intelligent patriotism of the heroes of Valley Forge.

Laureled crowns for the breech-clouted denizens of the swamp and the lord of a mansion of hoop poles and leaves, but the eternal soup bone and $1 per week for subsistence to the brawn and muscle which built up and created the mightest empire in the history of the world! [Applause.]

Is it any wonder, Mr. Chairman, that the gravity of the author of the "Science of Nutrition" has been met with laughter; that his dignity has excited ridicule; that his egotism has been rebuked; that his sarcasm has been accepted as buffoonery, and that his menus for workingmen have been utilized as daylight nightmares for the amusement of the best-fed toilers in the world, while his conspicuous eccentricities as a self-constituted guide and monitor to the legislative and administrative divisions of his Government have been charitably condoned and overlooked, because of the grotesque and imbecile viciousness which stamped them as the unbalanced emanations of a visionary inflicted with the midnight hallucinations of a senile trance? [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. CAPRON. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] desire to occupy further time now?

Mr. HAY. No; I do not.

Mr. CAPRON. I agreed to yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, but I understand he declines to use it now. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] wish to go on?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; I do not want to go on now.

Mr. HAY. Several gentlemen on this side desire to speak; but no one of them happens to be in the Chamber now.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further general debate desired, the Chair will be glad to have the Clerk read the bill.

Mr. HAY. I know that both the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] and myself have agreed to yield time to certain gentlemen; but no one of them seems to be here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that by unanimous consent we might save time by reading the bill now, and then going back for general debate.

Mr. HAY. I make that request.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] yield to me for one minute?

Mr. HULL. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I want to use that one moment to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] to the fact that on page 26 of the bill he will find a paragraph headed "Barracks and quarters, Philippine Islands." I supposed that this had been overlooked by the gentleman, from the fact that a similar clause contained in the bill of a year ago attracted his attention to a very considerable extent. There was some parliamentary movement with regard to that matter. There were many speeches. The gentleman from Tennessee indulged in one. He made that language the basis of somewhat alarming prophecies with regard to the future of his country. He has said nothing about it. No gentleman upon that side of the House has referred to the fact that this very dangerous, incendiary language is again repeated in this bill, and I thought it was only kindly on my part to call the attention of my friend to the fact that the language was there.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am very much obliged, and take occasion to make this public acknowledgment to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. I assure him, however, that we will try to get along on this side of the House without his valuable assistance in the matter. If I am not mistaken, the conditions and circumstances are not the same now as when that measure was presented a year ago. If I am not mistaken, the gentleman who is chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. HULL] made the point of order and begun the war against the proposition when it was presented to this House, and to which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] now calls attention. The gentleman from his own State, the chairman of the Military Committee, raised the issue himself at that time by making the point of order, which the Chair sustained, against the very proposition to which the gentleman now adverts. We simply followed up the objection after it was made. The words we objected to were in an emergency bill presented by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—a deficiency bill, and not the regular military appropriation bill which we are now considering. So I think the gentleman had better reconsider his suggestion to aid us on this side of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Of course the gentleman will recall that he had respectable association with him on that occasion. My colleague was with him.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman, then, ought to level his guns upon his own colleague.

Mr. HEPBURN. My colleague was with him in raising the point of order to the time and place in which the language was used, but the gentleman's objection was to caring for the army in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is not the case, and no such objection was ever made by any gentleman on this side of the House.

Mr. HEPBURN. The objection that the gentleman made was to building barracks for the comfort, for the care, for the preservation of the health of the Army of the United States. Now, then, I find the same solicitude upon the part of the Committee on Military Affairs with regard to the health, with regard to the comfort, of the Army; but the gentleman is silent now, he is not objecting now, and what is the reason?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We have not reached it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Ah, he has learned something, I think.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Not at all.

Mr. HEPBURN. The people have spoken; there has been a response to his speeches and to his efforts; so that after all it was only kindly in me to call his attention to this oversight on his part, to the fact that he had not gotten into his frenzy and paroxysm of terror, as he should have done if he was right a year ago.

Mr. HAY rose.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would repeat that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] should level his guns against his own colleague [Mr. HULL], who made the point of order against the proposition to take care of the soldiers in the Philippine Islands. According to the argument of the gentleman's colleague——

Mr. HULL. Not at all.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This is true according to the argument of the gentleman's colleague. He says we were making war against the Army. I say to the gentleman that he made war against the Army, if any war was made, because he made the point of order against the proposition contained in the deficiency bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to take care of the soldiers by building them barracks in the Philippine Islands. Now, if there was any war, which I deny, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] started it, for he made the point of order. The Chair sustained the point of order. The amendment was changed. That is the history of the matter. The amendment was modified by the gentleman in charge of the bill, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. HULL. Let me ask the gentleman right there, was the opposition of the gentleman then modified?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes; because they attempted to do indirectly what the Chair held they could not do directly, and we simply opposed when they undertook to put the measure, against the rules, into that urgent deficiency bill. We said, "Bring it up upon the military appropriation bill, and there will possibly be no objection to it." It was put into the appropriation bill properly afterwards, and there was no serious fight made against it. So my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] is altogether off the track when he attempts to discover a mare's nest to-day. We will attempt to take care of the appropriation when it is reached.

Now, if the gentleman wants to attack anyone, let him attack my friend [Mr. HULL] the chairman of the Military Committee, who brought on the war in the last session of this Congress against this proposition. He did not see fit to follow it up. We did, because they were doing indirectly what they could not do directly. That was all there was in it.

No, Mr. Chairman, the effort to place this side of the House in the position of making war on the soldiers in the Philippines failed then and it will always fail, because there is as much patriotism on this side of the House as on that when the United States Army is involved. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

[Mr. GROSVENOR addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HAY. I now yield forty-five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, says he expects to see Missouri go Democratic in 1904. If he is fortunate enough to live until Missouri casts her electoral vote for a Republican candidate for the Presidency, he will double discount Methuselah as the oldest man that ever lived. [Laughter.] That State had a bad case of Republican maladministration for eight years, and I undertake to say that since the morning stars first sang together there was never such a saturnalia of crime in the history of the human race as the Republicans held in Missouri.

A burnt child dreads the fire and a scalded cat is afraid of cold water. [Laughter.]

Missouri will not go Republican in a fair contest until the people of that magnificent Commonwealth have lost the power of memory.

I have never vaunted myself or been exploited by my friends as a prophet of either the major or the minor variety. Disclaiming all powers of vaticination, I shall draw some conclusions from the plain facts of history. There is an old saying, "Fight the devil with fire," and while I do not say that the gentleman from Ohio resembles Old Nick very much [laughter], though one of my colleagues once said on the floor of this House that he looked like Santa Claus and talked liked Satan, I propose to fight him with his arithmetical plan here to-day. I have never been held up to the community as a lightning calculator, although I understand the multiplication table. Out in Ohio, and even beyond the ample confines of that State, my friend bears the soubriquet of "Old Figgers."

To-day I happened to be standing down in the hall by the post-office. An old employee of the House was talking to a "tenderfoot." The General swept by in his majesty, tenderly fondling his prophet's beard; and the old employee said to the newcomer, "There goes the Stud Bug of arithmetic." [Laughter.]

The principal thing in my Washington Post interview of which the gentleman complains is this language:

> The results of the November elections prove that the trend is toward Democracy. That we did not win the House is true, but we cut down the Republican majority by one-third.
> Except for the action of one man—President Roosevelt, in the matter of the anthracite coal strike—we would have captured the House and carried New York. Even as it is, a great many persons believe that we did carry New York, for the party which stole the Presidency from Tilden is not above stealing the governorship from Coler.
> The revolution in Rhode Island and the reduced Republican majorities generally in the Eastern States show that Republicanism is on the down grade.
> Since the confusion of tongues on the plain of Shinar, at the foot of the unfinished tower of Babel, there never fell from human lips a more preposterous statement than that made by General GROSVENOR in the House on December 17 in these words: "When the election was over, there was nothing left of the Democratic party."
> After winning a great fight, in which his losses were frightful, reviewing the field of slaughter, Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, mournfully exclaimed: "Another such a victory and I am undone!" I commend those words of wisdom to my venerable, vitriolic, and jubilant friend from Ohio.

Thereupon he remarked that I am an expert in quoting Scripture and in making Scriptural references, to which soft impeachment I plead guilty. Then he undertakes to modify what he said. Now, I recognize the fact that General GROSVENOR is one of the ablest debaters in the House; not only that, he is the hardest man to "corner" that I ever clapped my eyes on. [Laughter.] Here is precisely what he said:

> When the election was over, there was nothing left of the Democratic party.

That is a plain statement in plain language. "Nothing left of the Democratic party." "Nothing"—not little, but absolutely "nothing." That is the gravamen of that charge. He comes in to-day and undertakes to squirm out of his position by saying that he said, "The Democratic party was fading away." He said nothing of the sort. What he did say, and what I criticised in that interview, was that "when the election was over there was nothing left of the Democratic party," which is much stronger than the way he endeavors to put it in his revised version.

Now, gentlemen, I want to ask you something. The Democratic party elected 178 Representatives to the Fifty-eighth Congress out of a possible 386. Does that look as if there was "nothing left of the Democratic party?" The States which the Democrats carried in 1902 would have given 158 electoral votes out 476 if the election had been for President. Does that look as if the Democratic party was "fading away" or that there was "nothing left of it?" In the light of these facts, was not the gentleman's statement preposterous?

I understand perfectly well that a great many people who have not looked into this matter—many Republicans—nearly all of them—and a good many Democrats—think that the prospects of the Democratic party to elect a President in 1904 are nil. I am here to affirm, not only to affirm, but to prove, that the last declaration which I made in that interview which the gentleman read—that the Democrats go into the campaign of 1904 with an equal chance of success—is true. Here are the figures: If no more States are admitted, there will, in 1904, be 476 votes in the electoral college. Two hundred and thirty-nine will be required to elect the President and Vice-President.

In 1902 the Democrats carried Alabama, with 11 electoral votes; Arkansas, with 9; Florida, with 5; Georgia, with 13; Kentucky, with 13; Louisiana, with 9; Mississippi, with 10; Missouri, with 18; Nevada, with 3; North Carolina, with 12; Rhode Island, with 4; South Carolina, with 9; Tennessee, with 12; Texas, with 18; and Virginia, with 12, aggregating 158. Therefore, in order to elect a President and Vice-President in 1904 the Democrats must hold the States they have, and in addition thereto carry enough States to give them 81 more electoral votes. Can they do that? The chances are fairly good for them to do so. Most assuredly we are not "without hope in the world."

In what States have we the best chance to gain 81 electors? Now, listen. The father of arithmetic has talked, but listen to these plain figures: From 1900 to 1902 the Republican majorities shrank in the following States by more than one-half; the same kind of shrinkage that has taken place in the last two years continued for the next two years would give them to the Democrats in 1904:

In Wisconsin from 106,581 to 47,599; in New York from 143,606 to 8,803. What do you think of that? In New Jersey from 56,899 to 17,133. In California—the gentleman wants to go West; I will go with him to the Pacific—in California the shrinkage was from 39,770 to 1,550. Does the General find any hope for Republicanism in that? In Pennsylvania from 288,433 to 156,410.

In Michigan the shrinkage was from 104,584 to 37,184; in Massachusetts from 81,869 to 37,120; in New Hampshire from 19,314 to 8,271.

These States have 142 electoral votes, 61 more than we need.

No man in his senses believes that the Democrats will carry Pennsylvania. Hence, the 34 votes of the Keystone State ought to be subtracted from the 61, which leaves 27 more than we need; but in discussing the possibilities and probabilities of 1904 the 7 votes of Connecticut and the 8 votes of Maryland ought to be added to the Democratic 27, making 42 more than we need; for while their Republican majorities did not fall off 50 per cent or more, Connecticut fell from 28,570 to 16,107 and Maryland from 13,946 to 8,508, the latter figures being the aggregate majorities for Congressmen in 1902, they having no State ticket. In estimating the chances it must also be remembered that both Connecticut and Maryland are normally Democratic States, and go Republican only in moments of temporary aberration. [Laughter.]

There is another group of States to which I wish to call the prayerful attention of the gentleman from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, and on which he should fix his eagle eye when he again essays the rôle of prophet. The small Republican majorities which they gave last year will furnish much food for reflection when he takes out his pencil and his pad to record his prognostications for 1904. In 1902 Delaware gave 4,153 Republican majority; Montana, 10,486; Nebraska, 5,355; Utah, 4,781; West Virginia, 12,773; Idaho, 5,853; Colorado, 7,295; Wyoming, 4,466. Those States have 35 electoral votes.

There is not a man in this House, Democrat or Republican, who can not recall single Congressional districts in the United States that have made a greater change in two years than needs to be made by any one of those States in order to swing into the Democratic column. There are Congressional districts—I will name one of them right now—which prove this statement. I do not know the number of it, but it is the one represented by Mr. THAYER, of Massachusetts. That district gave Hon. Joseph H. Walker, Republican, 12,000 majority the last time he was elected, and two years after that Mr. THAYER, Democrat, was elected by a majority of some 300. How can the gentleman from Ohio extract any comfort out of that group of States? If he can, he is the Mark Tapley of American politics.

If I were disposed to be extravagant I might claim, for the sake of argument, that Oregon probably would go Democratic, because in 1900 it gave McKinley 13,141 majority and last year it elected a Democratic governor, who is inaugurated to-day, by 276 majority. But I do not believe that Oregon is any more likely to become Democratic than is Vermont. She seems to be joined to her idols. In the same way, by the same process of reasoning, if a man were simply trying to claim things he could claim the State of Michigan on account of the great falling off; he could claim the State of Minnesota on account of the great falling off; but the facts are that the antecedents of Michigan and Minnesota, notwithstanding the great falling off, convince a rational man that the Democrats have no reasonable chance of carrying those States.

Another thing. The gentleman says that the tide of Republicanism is extending west. It is equally true that the tide of Democracy is extending east. Does anybody believe that it is an unreasonable prophecy to say that New York will go Democratic in 1904? Why, it only takes a change of a little over 4,000 votes to do it. If New York goes Democratic, the chances are that Connecticut, New Jersey, Maryland, and Delaware will all go Democratic, because they have usually voted together and they have been Democratic more often than Republican.

Mr. WACHTER. Not lately, in Maryland.

Mr. CLARK. Oh, I know; not since 1896. The gentleman is not imparting any information to me on that subject. When the Democrats have been together they have invariably carried Maryland.

Mr. WACHTER. But they do not get together any more.

Mr. CLARK. Well, they are very nearly as much together as MCCOMAS and MUDD are. [Laughter and applause.] "Under which king do you fight, Bezonian?" [Laughter.]

Mr. WACHTER. I do not know just now.

Mr. CLARK. Another thing. Take the antecedents of the State; take its history and its surroundings, and where would you say West Virginia ought to be? In the last three or four elections it has gone Republican. The chances are that when the Democrats are reunited, as they surely will be, West Virginia will go with the Democrats, and there are 7 more electoral votes. Take another case, the case of California. That went Republican by only 1,550 votes. Oh, I know it was for governor of the State; of course they were not voting for the President in 1902; but California gave McKinley a Republican majority of 39,770 in 1900, and in 1902 it fell off to 1,550.

These States have enough electoral votes to elect, with 5 to spare.

To sum up. These States are reliably Democratic: Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, Nevada, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia, with 154 electoral votes.

There are 174 electoral votes certainly Republican in my judgment: Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Vermont, and Washington.

There are 148 doubtful; California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Idaho, Maryland, Massachusetts, Montana, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Rhode Island, Utah, West Virginia, and Wisconsin. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.] We do not have to have all those to elect the President. You Republicans laugh because you do not know any better. The Hon. Thomas B. Reed, a great man, the most brilliant man of his day, wrote me once, in discussing some political matters, that "The wisdom of this world is to shout with the majority." That is all you know over on that side. [Laughter.] We do not have to carry all these States.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to ask you a question.

Mr. CLARK. Well.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Taking the States of the North, that have had their majorities reduced between a Presidential year and an off year, and applying the same ratio to the Southern States, taking the vote in the Presidential year and the vote in the last election, are you not afraid that two years from now there will not be any vote there? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK. Oh, no.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Under the same rule of reduction, would not the vote there disappear entirely?

Mr. CLARK. Oh, no. Now, are you through?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. I have not ciphered on any of the Southern States. I know the vote of Missouri. The majority increased there from about 32,000 in 1900 to about 45,000 in 1902.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Under the Nesbitt law.

Mr. CLARK. Yes; and the Nesbitt law is a better law than the Republicans of Missouri ever passed. You are always howling here about the Nesbitt law; and yet when the Republicans were in power in Missouri the intelligence and the wealth of the State were not allowed to vote at all. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You disfranchised Frank Blair, who created the Republican party in Missouri, who marched with Sherman to the sea, who was called the Marshal Ney of that army. He sued the election judges who refused him permission to vote and brought the case to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the court declared the test oath of the Drake constitution to be unconstitutional. A man could not preach the gospel——

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. CLARK. Wait until I finish this statement and then you can get all the permission you want. A man could not teach school in the State of Missouri, he could not preach the gospel, he could not shrive a dying man, he could not practice law, he could not vote, he could hold no office, without swearing to a lie by taking a test oath as long as your arm. That is the way the Republicans ran that State when they had it, and that is the reason they are not going to get it again very soon. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I do not propose to enter into an argument with my friend on the war times——

Mr. CLARK. No; I guess you do not.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Nor do I care to shake the "bloody shirt."

Mr. CLARK. No; I suppose you do not.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. But I will call the attention of the House to the fact that outside of the three large cities of the State of Missouri, namely, St. Louis, Kansas City, and St. Joseph, the Democratic majority has been reduced to 12,000; and if the average Republican majority, the honest Republican majority, of those three cities had been allowed to be cast at the last election Missouri would have gone Republican in 1902. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, there is not a syllable of truth in that statement, not a particle. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] The Nesbitt law does not apply in the city of St. Joseph or in Kansas City. Does the gentleman think it does? Does it, or does it not? The gentleman can answer that, yes or no.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The Nesbitt law applies to the city of St. Louis.

Mr. CLARK. Then why do you talk about St. Joseph and Kansas City?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. But they have another law for Kansas City and another law for St. Joseph.

Mr. CLARK. The very same identical law that applies to every county in Missouri except the city of St. Louis applies to the city of St. Joseph and the city of Kansas City, except the registration part of the law. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Well, it is St. Louis I speak of.

Mr. CLARK. You gentlemen laugh because you are ignorant. The constitution of Missouri provides that you can not have a registration law in a county of less than a hundred thousand inhabitants, and the reason that that clause was put in the constitution was because when the Republicans ran the State the registration officers ruthlessly ruled out the Democrats—the owners of the soil, the men that had blazed the wilderness and made a great State—and would not allow them to register or vote at all.

Old Gen. James Shields, a hero of two wars, a major-general in the Mexican war and a major-general in the Union Army—I heard him say once that he came nearer to thrashing Stonewall Jackson than any other man that ever lived, but did not do it by a damned sight. [Laughter.] He was elected to Congress. The Republicans of Missouri would not let him come. They would not give him his certificate. That was the way they ran the registration law; and a man has to have more gall than all the mules that served in the Spanish war [laughter] to get up here and talk about the Nesbitt law in the face of the Republican record in the State of Missouri.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That is thirty years ago.

Mr. CLARK. The Spanish war? You had better read up your arithmetic.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. You were speaking of the Republican record of Missouri thirty years ago.

Mr. CLARK. Did you ever read the Bible? It says the leopard can not change his spots or the Ethiopean his skin. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The gentleman will admit one thing—that the party that is competent to run the country is competent to run Missouri. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK. Yes; it ran it into the ground, so that we are just getting out of debt, after years of paying it, that you piled up on us from 1865 to 1871. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

When the Republicans came into power the State had a first-mortgage debt on railroad property; enough after selling the railroads to pay twice the State debt. When they went out they left a debt approximating $26,000,000, and this year the last of the bonds are being paid off.

I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to another thing. It seems very funny when you have a large majority and the pie counter to feed at to talk fluently about what you are going to do. The Democrats to elect a President—I count out Rhode Island, because I think our success there in 1902 was largely accidental—must carry New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Nebraska, California, and Utah. How many votes will have to change to carry New York? Four thousand four hundred and two. Do you think that is a large change in a State which has so large a vote as New York? In New Jersey 8,567 will do the work; in Delaware, 2,077; in Maryland, 4,254; in Nebraska, 2,678; in California, 776; in Utah, 2,392 votes; and a change of 25,142 in the popular vote gives us the President and Vice-President of the United States, with two electoral votes to spare.

Mr. WACHTER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir; with pleasure.

Mr. WACHTER. When the Democrats are changing the votes I suppose the gentleman thinks the Republicans are going to sit with their hands in their laps. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK. Oh, no; you are going to have your hands in the Treasury up to your shoulders. [Great laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are few other things in this matter that I desire to devote some remarks to. I do not blame the gentleman from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, for lambasting Missouri when he can. She is a great obstacle to Republicans. She stands fifth in population, fourth in wealth, is the most populous State that invariably gives her electoral vote to the Democratic candidates, the most Northern State that is always Democratic. She is a veritable bulwark of Democracy. I do not wonder at his making that assault. He attacks gerrymandering in Missouri. He repeats that like a great poll parrot, after learning it from my friend from St. Louis [Mr. BARTHOLDT]. Dr. BARTHOLDT has gone around this Capitol telling that monstrous canard until people have come to take it seriously.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman permit a question right here?

Mr. CLARK. Well?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Is it true that the district represented by myself has a population of 305,000, and that the two districts now represented or in the next House to be represented by Democrats have an equal population. In other words, that my district has been made as large as the two others are, combined?

Mr. CLARK. I do not know, but for the sake of argument grant that it has; and yet in New York we have one district of 315,000 people and another of only 135,000. What are you going to do about that? And a Republican legislature, too.

If the gentleman from St. Louis has 305,000 people in his district, he is to be congratulated. The more Missourians you have in your district the better you are off. [Laughter.] Why, he was bellowing around here at the last Congress because the Democratic legislature had given him a district with 60,000 Republican majority in it! Good heavens! Think of that! Why, I have known men—and you would not have to walk 100 feet to find some of them—who would have been satisfied with 6,000 or 600 or 60 majority, or even 6 majority! [Laughter.]

The legislature of Missouri made 15 Democratic districts and 1 Republican district. All that I regret about it is that human ingenuity could not make 16 Democratic districts. [Laughter.]

I do not advise gerrymandering. I do not indorse it. I think it is a bad thing; but the Republicans practice it, and we have to practice it in self-defense—the supreme law of nature. General GROSVENOR howled because Dr. BARTHOLDT howled about gerrymandering in Missouri. What do you think of Maine? I see my friend Mr. LITTLEFIELD in front of me. There are enough Democrats in Maine to easily elect one Congressman and nearly enough to elect two, and yet we have not a particle more chance under the Republican gerrymander of electing a Democratic Congressman from Maine than we have of being translated in a chariot of fire after the manner of Elijah. Not a bit, and never will until we get the legislature.

Take Kansas, for instance. They elected the entire Republican outfit out there, and I shall tell you how they did it. A Republican legislature passed this kind of a law: That a man could not be nominated by two parties; that he could not be voted for on two tickets—that is, that fusion is absolutely prohibited; and in that way, by that species of fraud, they returned a delegation here. Mirabile dictu! The Republican supreme court refused to consider the constitutionality of that law on the ground that being candidates themselves they were interested parties! The supreme court of California declared just such a law unconstitutional.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will my friend allow me an interruption?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That very wise provision in the Kansas law was copied from a law long on the statute books of Ohio.

Mr. CLARK. That does not make it a bit better. [Laughter.] I think more political deviltry has originated in Ohio than in all the rest of the States of the American Union put together. [Great laughter.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will my friend from Missouri excuse me?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I want to ask whether there is any disproportion in the population of the Maine Congressional districts?

Mr. CLARK. I don't know about that.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What kind of a scheme would the gentleman from Missouri put up in Maine to elect a Democratic Congressman?

Mr. CLARK. I would put enough Democrats in a district to constitute a majority and carry it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Could the gentleman do that in contiguous territory?

Mr. CLARK. As nearly so as I could make it. [Laughter.]

Now, let us take Connecticut. I am not afraid of these comparisons. Connecticut has enough Democrats to elect 2 Congressmen and nearly enough to elect 3, and yet the entire 5, under Republican gerrymandering, are Republican. They are clever gentlemen, and personally I like them.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. The State of Connecticut has not been redistricted since eighteen forty-odd.

Mr. CLARK. I know that.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. No party, neither the Democratic party, which has been in power, nor the Republican party, has ever reported in favor of redistricting the State.

Mr. CLARK. No; you haven't changed your basis of representation, as I understand it, since the Indians were driven out of the woods. [Laughter.] The biggest cities of Connecticut have no greater representation in the legislature than the rotten boroughs of Connecticut, and that is the reason you are going to elect Senator PLATT, and no other reason.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. A good portion of a very small minority of Democrats in the present Connecticut general assembly secured their election by pledging themselves to vote for Senator PLATT.

Mr. CLARK. I understand that, but a Democrat would never be elected in the State of Missouri if he agreed to vote for a Republican nominee.

Now, take another State, the State of Washington, which has nearly enough Democrats to elect 2 Congressmen.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not wish to disturb the gentleman, but I would like to interrupt him once more.

Mr. CLARK. Very well.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Maine has only one Democratic county, and I would like to ask the gentleman how he would get a Democratic Congressional district in Maine?

Mr. CLARK. Let me tell you about that. If you will repeal that prohibition law you have got up there [laughter]; that sounds very funny, but you repeal that prohibitory law that is used as a Republican election machine and that State will go Democratic to-morrow. [Laughter.] The blind tigers are run wide open. The gentleman from Maine stated here on the floor of this House that there was not an open bar in Maine.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If the gentleman will pardon me, that is not what I said. I said that there was not an open saloon in Maine to which attention would be directed if you were not looking for it.

Mr. CLARK. I will tell you the whole story. On the 17th day of June I made a speech at Bangor, Me.

I went out of the hotel and walked down the street. I saw what looked to me like a barroom. It had the screen——

Mr. WACHTER. You know one when you see it.

Mr. CLARK. Yes; I regret to say that I know what a barroom is, and so do the rest of you. The difference is, I am honest about it. I walked back. I did not want a drink, and did not take a drink in Maine. I was going to make a speech; but I did walk out into the street so that I could see past that screen into the barroom, and fifteen fellows were bellying up to that counter taking a drink. As a matter of curiosity I walked down the street three blocks and back on the other side of the street three blocks, and counted seventeen saloons. I went back to the hotel and I asked an intelligent man about it. "Why," said he, "that is the way the Republicans carry the State," and he said, "This is the way they do it——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It seems the gentleman was looking for them.

Mr. CLARK. No; I was not. I could not help seeing them. A man with two good eyes in his head must see them. This gentleman said the sheriffs were Republicans usually—all but that preacher down there at Portland, or up in your county.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; he is in Cumberland.

Mr. CLARK. He said the prosecuting attorneys were Republicans, and that they and the sheriffs would go to these fellows running the blind tigers about a week before election and say: "Here, you have been running these things in violation of the law all this year, and if you do not vote ten Democrats for the Republican ticket on election day we will shut you up and land you in jail." And that is the way they make prohibition the tender and feeder to the Republican party in the State of Maine. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. POU. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that I have seen a statement signed by the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] in which he sets forth that there were about 70 barrooms in his own city of Rockland in which he lives. I do not know whether the rest of the State averages up in the same way or not.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman has never seen any statement signed by "the gentleman from Maine" in which he said there were any open saloons in the town in which he lives.

Mr. POU. I did not say "open saloons."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Legitimate saloons.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; any open saloons. I never made any such statement.

Mr. POU. I did not say "open saloons."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I said an open saloon, open exactly as other stores are open for other purposes, for the sale of ordinary goods.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How about saloons at all?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Why, there are saloons in Maine. I never have denied that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; but I would really like to go on. I want to finish this gerrymander business. In Wisconsin there are enough Democrats to elect five or six Congressmen, and yet the Republicans gerrymandered that State so that we could not elect any at all until they got into a row among themselves up there this fall which started here in the House, about Cuban reciprocity, and we did manage to goble up one.

Now, I take it the State of Iowa comes nearer to being the typical Republican State than any other State in the Union.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit me to make one brief statement?

Mr. CLARK. Well, if it is very brief. My time is about out.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There was a gerrymander in Wisconsin some years ago. A political party took it to the supreme court, and the supreme court decided it unconstitutional. An extra session of the legislature was called and another gerrymander was adopted, and the supreme court decided that unconstitutional, and subsequently a proper subdivision of the State was made as it now stands, and as is agreed by all parties to be constitutional and right.

Mr. CLARK. Oh, when there are only four or five Democrats in the legislature, they can not make very much noise. I want to repeat it, Mr. Chairman, I do not clear the skirts of the Democrats about gerrymandering, but all parties do it, and it does not lie in the mouths of Republicans, General GROSVENOR or Dr. BARTHOLDT or anybody else, to come in here and attack Missouri because we did a scientific job of gerrymandering there.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CLARK. Wait a minute. I want to finish this Iowa proposition and then I will let you in again.

I take it that Iowa comes as near being a typical Republican State as any in the Union.

It has a high class of citizens; it has a great delegation on the floor of this House. There are enough Democrats in the State of Iowa to elect five Congressmen easily, yet for the last six or eight years they have never elected a solitary Democrat. This year, by some kind of good fortune, we managed to pull in with one.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion with reference to that?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I want to say to the gentleman that the district in which he says they "pulled in with one" was 15,000 Democratic at the time it was organized; but the Democrats could not hold it, and it turned Republican within six years, and has been going Republican ever since.

Mr. CLARK. Now, that is not any information to me whatever.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. You complain that we organized the district so that——

Mr. CLARK. No; I complain that you had control of that legislature for the last eight years and you fixed the apportionment so that you did not think we could carry any district in the State, and you slipped up on that.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I want to say to the gentleman that, on the contrary, we organized that district with 15,000 Democratic majority. We gathered together the Democratic counties in that region and put them in that district with that Democratic majority; but they could not hold it, and the district turned Republican within six years.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman from Missouri will allow me to say that the "gerrymander" whereby 15,000 Democratic majority was put into that district, which you this year carried, was twenty-one years ago. There has been no change in our law on that subject since.

Mr. CLARK. Well, all right. Now, one word to my Brother SMITH. You carried that district in 1894, did you not?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK. And you carried it in 1896; you carried it in 1898; you carried it in 1900, but you lost it in 1902.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa rose.

Mr. CLARK. Answer me now, yes or no.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I say no. We carried the district this year on the State ticket.

Mr. CLARK. Did you carry it for Congress?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. We did not. Your candidate for Congress ran ahead of his ticket.

Mr. CLARK. Does not that show that the Democrats are coming into their own again?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It may show that the district has come within 15,000 of what it was twenty-one years ago.

Mr. CLARK. We have won a Congressman anyway.

Now, take the State of Minnesota. That State has in it enough Democrats to elect four or five Democratic Congressmen, yet in 1894 we did not elect one, in 1896 we did not, in 1898 we did not, in 1900 we did not; but this year, for the first time in eight years, we elected one Congressman in the State of Minnesota. Is there any brother from Minnesota who wants to rise and testify in this meeting? [Laughter.]

The conclusion of the whole matter is this: On the subject of gerrymandering, the Democrats of Missouri simply followed a bad Republican precedent when they gerrymandered that State so that the Republicans could elect but one Congressman; but it does not lie in the mouth of General GROSVENOR, it does not lie in the mouth of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT], it does not lie in the mouth of any Republican to stand up here and make faces at the Democrats on the subject of gerrymandering. We are willing to compare our record with the Republican record.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman yield to me now?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, if you will be quick.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Why does not my colleague compare the States immediately east and west of Missouri with Missouri? The Republicans of Missouri have a perfect right——

Mr. CLARK. Now the gentleman is making a speech.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. No. They have a perfect right to point to the fairness of the Republicans in Illinois and the Republicans in Kansas, as compared with the conduct of the Democrats in Missouri, because in Illinois——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, the Republicans of Illinois last year gerrymandered two men out of their seats who are now sitting on the floor of this House.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. But the fact is, nevertheless, that Illinois——

Mr. CLARK. I can not let you take my time for a speech.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Out of 25 members give the Democrats 8, and their majority is 75,000.

Mr. CLARK. You gerrymandered with the intention that "BOB" WILLIAMS should not come back here; you put him in a district with 2,500 Republican majority; but he came back nevertheless. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, there is another thing to which I wish to direct the attention of my friend from Ohio. He stood up here the other day in that speech which I declared was so preposterous, and he exploited the Republican party for attacking the trusts. He is fond of declaring that the antitrust law is a Republican measure, that John Sherman was its father. There is not a syllable of truth in it. I will tell you what John Sherman did—not because he hated the trusts, but because he hated Gen. RUSSELL A. ALGER, who was one of the principal owners in that big match factory they got after.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I would state upon the honor of RUSSELL A. ALGER himself, recently made with his name signed to it, that he never owned a cent of stock in the Diamond Match Company in his life.

Mr. CLARK. Well, John Sherman thought he did anyway. [Laughter.]

And John Sherman declares in his book that RUSSELL A. ALGER bought his Southern delegates away from him at Chicago when Gen. Benjamin Harrison was nominated for President, and he was after RUSSELL A. ALGER'S scalp when he introduced that bill and when he made that speech; and he sent for and paid for a manuscript copy of the decision of the Supreme Court, and whatever may have been the virtues of John Sherman he never paid for anything that he did not want pretty badly. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

He introduced his antitrust bill, and it went to the Committee on the Judiciary, made up of great lawyers, and they struck out every word of it except the enacting clause, and then inserted what is now known as the Sherman antitrust bill. On that committee were GEORGE G. VEST of Missouri, Senator George of Mississippi, HOAR of Massachusetts, and lawyers of that stamp, and here is what my friend from Ohio said in his exuberant mood—and, for some unaccountable reason, he did not revise it out of the RECORD, after his usual habit. [Laughter.] He says that the prosecution against the Addyston Pipe Company was begun in a Republican Administration. It is not true. That suit was instituted during Cleveland's second Administration by a Democratic Attorney-General, December 10, 1896.

General GROSVENOR also says "the joint traffic association was killed out by Republicans." He is mistaken again, for that prosecution was instituted by a Democratic Attorney-General January 8, 1896. January 8 is a good Democratic day. Several prosecutions against the trusts were carried to fruition by a Democratic Attorney-General, and the truth is that the Republican cry against the trusts is a stupendous piece of hypocrisy. Before the election they were going to cut the tariff down in order to kill the trusts. There is one man in this House on that side of the Chamber for whose candor I have great respect, and that is Governor STEELE.

I went to him one day and told him that I wanted the Committee on Ways and Means, of which he is a member, to give me a hearing on my bill to put white paper and wood pulp on the free list. With soldierly bluntness and straightforwardness he replied: "We will not give it to you; we do not propose to have any tariff tinkering." Now, if all you Republicans had been as honest as the gentleman from Indiana, there would not have been 150 of you elected to the next Congress. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

My friend from Wisconsin, Brother BABCOCK, blossomed out as a reformer and trust-buster of the first magnitude. He was going to put certain schedules on the free list. He was going to play the very Old Harry with the trusts before the election, but since the election he has been cooing mildly as a sucking dove.

> The devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
> The devil got well, the devil a monk was he.

[Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I did not want to make this speech, but to finish up the gerrymandering business I desire to make one more statement—and I will put it in the proper connection when I come to write this speech out. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. Oh, it has already been written.

Mr. CLARK. That is all rot. I doctor my speeches as little as any man in this House, except Judge DE ARMOND, who does not doctor his at all.

There are 19 Republicans elected to the Fifty-eighth Congress who were gerrymandered into that Congress under the apportionment under the last census; but the gentleman from Ohio has nothing to say about that.

As I started to say, Mr. Chairman, I did not want to make this speech. I have not been fishing for opportunities to make speeches this session of Congress, but my valorous and belligerent friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] was determined to jump me, and he did jump me for paying him the exceedingly high compliment in that interview from which he has quoted. If he is satisfied with the result of this debate, so am I. Out West there was an adventurous hunter who went gunning for big game. He came to an untimely end and they buried him on the mountain side. Upon his tombstone was placed this inscription, which I commend to the gentleman from Ohio:

> He whistled for the grizzly and the grizzly came.

[Applause and laughter.]

Mr. HAY. I yield forty-five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

[Mr. SWANSON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I now yield eight minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I desire to correct a statement that I made in the colloquy which took place between the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD]. I think I made the statement that the gentleman from Maine had signed a statement, as I recollect it, that there were something over 70 barrooms in the city of Rockland. I regret that the gentleman from Maine is not in his seat, but no doubt he is familiar with the statement that he did sign and will recognize it when he sees it in the RECORD.

Now, in support of the statement made by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] that the temperance laws were not enforced in the State of Maine, I ask permission to read a petition which was presented some two years ago to the mayor and board of aldermen in the city of Rockland. It is printed in the Rockland Star, a newspaper with Republican sympathies. It recites a terrible condition of affairs, and the gentleman from Maine is to be commended for his strenuous efforts to enforce the law. I am told, however, that his efforts were futile, even under a Republican administration, and that the constitution and laws of his State, even since the presentation of the petition I shall read, are openly violated. The petition is as follows:

To the honorable mayor and board of aldermen of the city of Rockland:

We, the undersigned, citizens of Rockland, are convinced that the laws intended to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors, to suppress gambling places and houses of ill repute, are practically ignored in this city at the present time.

We assert that never within our recollection has this community been afflicted with such a pest of drunkenness and immorality as prevails to-day, and that evidence of its existence was never so bold, so defiant, and so conspicuous.

We believe this shameful state of affairs to be so apparent and so contrary to the wishes of our people as a whole that we deem it our duty to bring this matter formally to your attention and your duty to use your utmost authority to correct the evils of which we herewith complain.

It is neither wise nor safe for this municipality to tolerate any longer the growing spirit of lawlessness which enables so many resorts of intemperance and vice to flourish and increase. Too many opportunities are being offered for the hurtful diversion of wages and savings, many families are being deprived of necessaries and comforts, and the future of our youth is being endangered. The good name of the city is threatened, and the development of its business and property interests is being retarded and impaired. A determined effort, therefore, to remedy this condition appeals to us not only as a question of public and individual morality, but as one of good business and sound sense.

We most respectfully petition your honorable body to take such prompt and vigorous action as in your judgment may bring about a better enforcement of the laws against intemperance, gambling, and vice, and to this end we promise our sympathy and active support.

Rockland, Me., August, 1901.

I ask, Mr. Chairman, that this may be inserted in the RECORD, for the purpose of correcting the statement I made that this petition recited the number of barrooms which were operating in the gentleman's home town, and also for the purpose of elucidating the statement made by the gentleman from Maine that there are no open barrooms in his State.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] asks unanimous consent for the privilege of inserting in the RECORD the article which he has read and also of correcting his remarks.

Mr. HAY. I make the point of order that it is not necessary for the gentleman to have such consent. He read the article as a part of his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that there was a portion of the article in addition to what had been read.

Mr. POU. No, sir; I read the entire article. It was not as lengthy as I thought.

Mr. HAY. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I listened to-day with a great deal of pleasure to a great deal that has been said by gentlemen on the Republican side wherein they claim that the Republican party had swept the country at the last election, and will, they say, in the next, because the people believe in that party.

Mr. Chairman, there were quite a number of promises made by the leaders of the Republican party in the last canvass. If I mistake not, one of those promises was that the trusts should be outlawed. The President assured the people that they must take him at his word—at its "face value." So far nothing has been done on that subject.

The second promise was—and it now has come home to the party in power, it has come to the fireside of every cabin, every mansard, and every public building on the great Atlantic coast, if not throughout the country east of the Mississippi River, and that promise was—free coal.

The third promise was the enforcement of our antitrust laws.

The distinguished Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Moody, who was long an able member of this House, said that the tariff on anthracite coal was "smuggled into the Dingley bill in a sneaking and cowardly manner," and would have to be repealed by Congress at once, even though the coal operators protested.

But, Mr. Chairman, that tariff is still upon the statute books, although as the Dingley tariff act reads (I have a copy of the law here before me), "anthracite coal" is literally placed on the "free list;" but it is not "free" in fact or law, for we find nestled and almost covered up in the tariff act of 1897 a provision which says in substance that "all coal containing less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon shall pay a tariff duty of 67 cents per ton."

Sir, there is scarcely any anthracite or any other coal which contains that amount of fixed carbon. There is a little anthracite coal in Wales containing 72 and a bare fraction of fixed carbon. That is all. Mr. Austin, of the Bureau of Statistics, says in substance there is no such coal in the United States. I have his letter now on my desk thus speaking. All coal containing less than this prescribed 92 percentage of fixed carbon has to pay a tax of 67 cents per ton when brought into the United States. Yet we are, and have been for years, exporting thousands and thousands of tons of anthracite and bituminous coal to and underselling all other countries.

Mr. Chairman, I introduced a bill to put all coals on the free list to relieve our coal famine weeks and weeks ago. It is slumbering in the Ways and Means Committee. I also tried to have an amendment placed on two or three bills to put anthracite coal upon the free list in fact and in law. Of course, I failed in that effort in this a Republican House.

A distinguished Senator from the State of Massachusetts has introduced a bill placing all coal upon the free list for "ninety days;" also providing that when the Dominion of Canada shall place coal from the United States on the free list, we in turn will place all the coal brought into the United States from Canada upon the free list. This is a plain confession that we can compete successfully with foreign countries in our coal industries. Yet, now all imports of coal must pay 67 cents per ton.

At the same time the distinguished Senator said, in substance: "I am aware there is doubt as to whether or not a revenue measure can 'originate' in the Senate." And he discussed that question seriously.

It has been since very seriously discussed; and the doubt as to the right of the Senate to "originate" such a bill is now assigned as one of the reasons for trying to smother the resolution introduced by the senior Senator from Missouri, Mr. VEST, to untax anthracite coal. So, to accommodate the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts; to accommodate his party, and to accommodate my friends, the Republicans, on the other side; to remove all excuses, and to rescue the people from a coal famine as quickly as possible, I introduce his bill in the House——

Mr. PAYNE. I make a point of order against the gentleman's discussing what is going on in the Senate.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I had just reached the point where I was discussing the question as one arising in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the point of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is well taken.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There have been so many illustrious examples set me by the distinguished gentleman from New York, in keeping with his "point of order," that I am not surprised that he should make it now. He always does his "plain duty."

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will confine himself to the rules, I will withdraw the point.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The record of the gentleman in this respect is so variable that I will not take up my valuable time in discussing it. I am aware of the rule—broken to-day a half dozen times in this debate.

However, to accommodate my friend from New York who interrupted me I will say that I introduced in the House the bill to which I have just alluded as having been introduced in the Senate, and I sent it to the Ways and Means Committee, of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is chairman. In addition to that, I introduced a copy of the joint resolution introduced in the Senate by one of my distinguished Democratic colleagues, and had it sent to the Ways and Means Committee, proposing to place anthracite coal on the free list. It sleeps in the Ways and Means Committee room. So, Mr. Chairman, if the Republicans desire to redeem their promises made to the people of the country—promises which doubtless caused many men to vote for them who otherwise would not have done so—there is now absolutely no excuse for their declining to stand up in behalf of the people who are suffering for coal, and nowhere more so than in the great Atlantic States, including the District of Columbia.

Mr. Chairman, we have a strike commission, I am glad to say, trying to do some good work in settling the strike and exposing the coal trust of Pennsylvania.

On yesterday we gladly voted to refer the great coal-famine question to a committee to investigate, presided over by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

This committee is to get on the train and on ships and go to find out what? Is a coal famine in the country; what caused it; its cure. Instead, Mr. Chairman, of repealing the tariff and allowing foreign coal to come in free, a policy General Garfield proposed in reference to the salt monopoly when that monopoly in the State of New York was robbing the people of cheap salt.

At that time General Garfield and Representative HALE, now a distinguished Senator, said it was an outrage that such a monopoly should exist, and proposed and made speeches in this House urging that the great monopoly should and would be crushed by placing salt upon the free list. I have their words now before me. They were selling salt just across the lake, in Canada, said General Garfield, for a dollar less than they were selling the same salt for in the State of New York where it was made.

We all remember well that quinine, which was selling from $5 to $10 an ounce, was placed upon the free list by a Democrat from Kentucky, Mr. McKenzie, and the quinine monopoly was crushed, and yet the legitimate quinine business is still thriving—the monopoly gone—and throughout this country and in the Philippine Islands chills and fevers are being destroyed by that very medicine, which sells now at from 25 to 50 cents an ounce.

But, Mr. Chairman, this great committee, presided over by my friend from Ohio, is to junket around and find if possible the "cause" of this great coal famine. They would junket while the people freeze. They want more laws made—while those we have are not enforced.

On the 4th of last November Mr. Hearst, of the New York Journal, recently elected by a huge majority a member of this Congress as a Democrat, sent a "sworn statement or petition," as he says, to the Attorney-General of the United States, Mr. Knox, making out a clear case of "an illegal combination or conspiracy among railroads named therein, engaged in interstate commerce," for the purpose of putting up the price of such commerce in coal right where the coal famine is now in existence, in New York and in the East, where the people are suffering. Yet the Attorney-General has not done one thing with that, except to refer it, I believe, to District Attorney Burnett, the district attorney of the United States for the southern district of New York, and there this great record rests.

I now send it to the desk and ask the Clerk to read a statement signed by Mr. Hearst, dated January 8, 1903, giving the history of this case as made by Mr. Hearst and sworn to, the record being in the possession of Attorney-General Knox, an able lawyer, I think, who well knows the power of Congress over interstate commerce is full and complete and gives Congress the right to prohibit interstate and international trust-made products from being sent from one State to another.

The Clerk read as follows:

MR. ROOSEVELT, YOU CAN END THE COAL FAMINE.

To Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States:

Sir: On October 4, more than three months ago, I had the honor of addressing a letter to you, informing you that I had petitioned your Attorney-General for permission to furnish him with conclusive proofs of the existence of a coal trust.

At the request of your Attorney-General, I submitted my proofs to General Burnett, United States district-attorney for the southern district of New York.

Those proofs demonstate, over the hands and seals of the corporations constituting the trust, that a combination of coal-carrying railroads absolutely controls the country's supply of anthracite and fixes its price to the consumer.

In the judgment of lawyers whose professional competency is quite as undisputed as that of your Attorney-General, those proofs if presented in court would suffice to dissolve the coal trust and subject its members to the civil and criminal penalties provided by law.

Continuously since the submission of those proofs the coal trust has robbed the people, extorting famine prices for coal, a prime necessity of industrial and domestic life, yet no action against this trust has been taken by your Attorney-General for the enforcement of the laws and the relief of the public.

So remarkable has been the lethargy of your Attorney-General in the face of a condition of things which reaches the gravity of a widespread public calamity that in both Houses of Congress a resolution has been introduced calling upon him to disclose the evidence submitted by me through my attorneys in October last.

These proofs aside, sir, neither you nor any other well-informed citizen can doubt the existence of the coal trust, nor be ignorant of the organized brigandage which it has practiced and is practicing.

You have but to consult the final report of the Industrial Commission to learn that the eight lines of railroad comprising the trust own nine-tenths of the anthracite deposits and mine three-quarters of the yearly product. From the same report you can ascertain that in order to crush out competition these railroads have charged extortionate freight rates. Compared with the charge per ton per mile on bituminous coal, the rate for carrying anthracite is so high that, in the language of Industrial Commissioner Phillips, the excess charge "is greater every year than the interest on our national debt," and is "made possible by the railroad monopoly, now euphoniously called 'community of interests.'"

The fact that the coal trust exists is notorious, and its character is universally understood.

A former Attorney-General of the United States, Richard Olney, on October 11 last, in a public address at Boston, said that the members of the trust are the "most unblushing and persistent of law breakers," and he thus specified:

"For years they have defied the law of Pennsylvania, which forbids common carriers engaging in the business of mining.

"For years they have discriminated between customers in the freight charges on their railroads, in violation of the interstate-commerce law.

"For years they have unlawfully monopolized interstate commerce, in violation of the Sherman antitrust law."

Senator SPOONER, of Wisconsin, a member of your own party, high in your confidence, in last Monday's debate on the Jones resolution directing the Attorney-General to transmit to the Senate the evidence presented to him by me proving that a conspiracy in restraint of interstate trade exists, said:

"I have been of the opinion that probably there is such a conspiracy." And he added that "if there be such a conspiracy it is one that should be prosecuted as one absolutely wicked in its character and far-reaching in its deleterious effects. * * * If one does exist it is a very merciless one, violating the laws of the United States and most harmful in every way."

You, Mr. President, can have no doubt of the existence of this conspiracy; but, if there should chance to remain in your mind any such doubt, I suggest that you remove it by personally examining the evidence which I placed in possession of your Attorney-General in October.

Sir, these men of the coal trust, enormously rich and politically influential as they may be, are criminals. They swell their great fortunes daily by deliberate lawbreaking.

And while your Attorney-General has remained so strangely quiescent these opulent and politically influential criminals have adopted an old trust device for the double purpose of further plundering the public and laying the basis for a fraudulent defense against the evidence now in the hands of the Attorney-General should he begin proceedings against them. A pretended division between them and the so-called "independent" operators has been arranged, whereby these so-called "independents," who are utterly in the power of the trust, shall seem to compete with the trust, and so prepare the ground for the false contention that the trust is not a monopoly, but a legitimate business organization subject to competition. As the immediate result of this counterfeit rivalry the price of coal has been doubled.

As a citizen regardful of the public welfare, Mr. President, I respectfully represent to you that the law officer of your Administration has been, and is, remiss in his duty in not proceeding against the coal trust on the evidence of its unlawful character supplied by me to him last year.

By that failure in duty he has encouraged the coal trust to take advantage of a situation largely of its own creation, not merely to persist in its customary pillage of the people, but to enormously increase the scale of its extortion.

The submission of evidence to your Attorney-General and my appeal to him to apply the law to the coal trust having up to this time resulted in no action on his part, I turn from him to you.

In your public speeches and messages, Mr. President, you have often declared your conviction that the great combinations of capital, commonly known as "trusts," should be subjected to the fullest publicity and brought within the regulating control of the law, to the end that the public, while profiting by the concentration of capital in business, may be protected against the incidental evil effects of that concentration.

I submit, sir, that there is no other combination of capital in the country more contemptuous of law than the coal trust. And I further submit that the most effective method of subjecting it to publicity is to bring it into court to answer for its illegal offenses.

The Attorney-General of the United States is your servant. He must obey your commands or give way to a successor who will do so.

I appeal to you, therefore, Mr. President, to command your Attorney-General to proceed against the coal trust, both civilly and criminally, on the evidence of its unlawful acts laid before him by me, or explain to the people of the United States his reasons for not doing so, if reasons suitable for public avowal he has.

The people of the United States, President Roosevelt, have a right to expect action from you against the trusts in general and the coal trust in particular. No conspicuous public man of your party has so vehemently as yourself expressed a desire to protect the public from spoliation at the hands of combinations of predatory capital. And you have well said that "words are good when backed up by deeds, and only so."

What better proof of your sincerity could you give, what better deed in support of your words could you do, than by moving at once upon this insolent lawbreaker and wholesale robber of the people, the coal trust?

As a citizen I have done my duty in supplying evidence for the attack to your Attorney-General. As a citizen I do my duty in turning from him to you when time has shown his invincible reluctance to act.

The coal trust continues to exist and continues to plunder because the laws are not enforced.

For that nonenforcement of the laws, Mr. President, your Attorney-General is responsible to you, and if you shall uphold him in his refusal to act against the coal trust, you will be responsible to the American people.

Respectfully,

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST.

NEW YORK, January 8, 1903.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Here is a complete "case" made out, filed with the Department, and yet nothing has been done with it, says Mr. Hearst. It is a case bearing directly upon the very question that Congress is now sending out a committee to investigate and "report on." We do not object to this committee. Not at all. I favored it—I favor any legitimate relief. But here is the Attorney-General of the United States, with all the money he needs, and all the machinery he needs, and all the power he needs, both in the statute and otherwise, and not one single, solitary thing has been done with this record, says Mr. Hurst, and although it is complete and ready for action by the Attorney-General, but he acts not, says Mr. Hearst, though he has had the record since November 4, 1902. Why no action? Why no injunctions? Why no indictments, while this trust robs and freezes the people, who are helpless?

Now, that is just in keeping with what the Hon. John Sherman said when the New York World asked him, on or about October 3, 1898, for some remedy for trusts. Mr. Secretary of State Sherman publicly replied that—the antitrust act (June 2, 1890) is valid and sufficient, and that if an Attorney-General and courts could be brought to enforce it relief to the people could be at once had.

The "courts" do act when the Attorney-General asks them. He alone can start the law to operating. Now, here we are suffering in this District. Nobody will dispute that.

Here is the statute, the antitrust act of June 2, 1890, that makes "every contract, combination in the form of a trust, or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of commerce in any Territory," including the District of Columbia, highly penal; and yet it seems, Mr. Chairman, certainly so far as the public press is concerned, that not a single injunction has been filed, not one single grand jury has been called together to indict, not one single judge has charged a jury, not a single man has been arrested, and not a single movement has been put on foot by this great Government to enforce this law in the District of Columbia for the relief of the people, whom we well know are at this minute suffering for coal.

There is no doubt about the law; no State lines to interfere. This is a District exclusively under the Federal courts. The Federal antitrust act of June 2, 1890, which clearly and literally applies to the District of Columbia, is powerful and drastic when the Attorney-General enforces it. This should be done, and at once.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I now ask that we proceed to the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, and read the first section.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] if he will not now agree that the committee rise.

Mr. HULL. I will state to my friend from Virginia that we might sit here a few minutes longer and read two or three pages, as another matter will come ahead of us to-morrow.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, we have not a quorum present and I shall raise the question.

Mr. HULL. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair Mr. BOUTELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16567) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MINORITY VIEWS OF CURRENCY BILL.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. FOWLER] has filed a report of that committee to-day on the currency bill (H. R. 16228).

I ask unanimous consent that such of the minority as desire may have five days in which to file their views.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the minority of the Committee on Banking and Currency have five days within which to file the views of the minority on the currency bill which has been reported from that committee to-day.

Mr. HILL. I am not authorized by the chairman of the committee to speak, but as we passed it in committee the vote was for five days from last Thursday. I suppose, however, there will be no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. The report has just been made to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] brought this matter to the attention of the Chair this morning, and meeting the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the Chair spoke to that gentleman about it—but the gentleman is here and he can speak for himself.

Mr. BARTLETT. The report has just been filed to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. FOWLER. What is the request?

The SPEAKER. That the minority of the Committee on Banking and Currency have five days in which to file their views on the currency bill.

Mr. FOWLER. Not from to-day. The understanding was that they were to have five days from the day that we voted to report the bill, with the honorable understanding that unless the bill came up for hearing we, as gentlemen, should agree upon an extension. I think five days from now would be too long.

Mr. BARTLETT. The understanding was that we were to have a reasonable time, and the bill has just been reported to-day.

Mr. FOWLER. What would be a reasonable time?

Mr. BARTLETT. I have already suggested five days from to-day.

Mr. FOWLER. I think that would be an unreasonable time.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will leave it to anyone in the House if it is an unreasonable time. The gentleman from New Jersey can object if he wants to, Mr. Speaker, but the understanding in the committee was that there should be a reasonable time, and there has not been sufficient time. I will state that I have been unable to get the report of the committee. I have never seen it. It has just been filed this afternoon.

Mr. FOWLER. I will say this, that I will consent to an extension of two days, and to five days if the bill does not come up for consideration within the five days.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. The question, then, is on a request for unanimous consent that the minority have five days within which to file their views, unless the bill is called up sooner for consideration, and that they shall have two days anyhow.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6949) granting an increase of pension to Mary L. Jacks; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ELKINS introduced a bill (S. 6950) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of bridges across the Ohio River, and to prescribe the dimensions of the same," approved December 17, 1872; and an act supplementary thereto, approved February 14, 1883; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. ALGER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $128,400 for the construction of barrack accommodations for four companies of infantry at Fort Brady, Mich., to replace those destroyed by fire, intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAPP submitted an amendment relating to the distribution of sets of Federal Cases to the circuit and district courts of the United States, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment relating to the distribution of sets of the Federal Reporter among the officers of the United States Government, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURNHAM submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 to enable the people of the Indian Territory to provide an exhibit of the products and resources of that Territory at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, in St. Louis, Mo., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Select Committee on Industrial Expositions, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $40,000 to enable the people of Alaska to provide and maintain an exhibit of the products and resources of that Territory at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, in the city of St. Louis, Mo., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Select Committee on Industrial Expositions, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment relating to the claims of officers of the United States Army for arrearages of longevity pay, intended to be proposed by him to the military appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF NAVIGATION.

On motion of Mr. FRYE, it was Ordered, That there be printed 600 additional copies of the Report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1902 for the use of the Bureau of Navigation.

CHAPLAINS IN THE NAVY.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That Senate Document No. 10, Fifty-seventh Congress, second session, be reprinted, and 800 additional copies be printed for the use of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REGULATION OF TRUSTS OR CORPORATIONS.

On motion of Mr. HOAR, it was Ordered, That 1,000 additional copies of the bill (S. 6659) for the regulation of trusts or corporations engaged in international or interstate commerce be printed for the use of the Senate.

INJUNCTIONS IN CONSPIRACY CASES.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there printed as a document, under the direction of the Secretary of the Senate, the petitions and remonstrances, without the names, for and against the passage of the bills (S. 1118, S. 4553, and H. R. 11060) "to limit the meaning of the word 'conspiracy,' and the use of 'restraining orders and injunctions' in certain cases," and for or against any amendments thereto which have been presented in the Senate during the Fifty-seventh Congress:

Provided, That where such petitions or remonstrances are identical in substance with others, only one such petition or remonstrance shall be printed.

CONDITIONS IN ISLAND OF GUAM.

Mr. HOAR. I offer a resolution for consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, so far as shall be, in his judgment, not inconsistent with the interests of the public service, to inform the Senate what government is existing in the island of Guam, and through what executive department the powers of such government are now in fact executed and administered;

What, according to his present information, is the number of inhabitants in said island;

Whether there be any persons imprisoned or detained in said island against their will by the authority of the United States;

If so, under what law such persons are detained, and by whose order such persons are detained;

And especially whether any person not an inhabitant of said island of Guam be detained there by the power of the United States against his will; if so, for what offense, and whether there has been any trial or conviction of such offense, or any charge made against such person, and whether the nature or character of such charge has been communicated to such person;

And whether any person is so therein detained for any alleged political offense, or any refusal to take an oath of allegiance to the United States;

And especially whether an inhabitant of the Philippine Islands named Mabini has been detained and be now therein detained, and, if so, under what circumstances, for what alleged offense, and whether such person has been tried for the same;

And, further, whether said Mabini was, according to the President's information, an inhabitant of the Philippine Islands and a Spanish subject on the 11th day of April, 1899, and then a resident in said islands; and whether he be included within the provisions of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of the civil government of the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," being chapter 1369 of the Statutes of 1902; and

Whether as such he is now deprived of liberty without due process of law; whether he has enjoyed the right to be heard by himself and counsel to demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him, to have a speedy and public trial, to meet witnesses face to face, and to have compulsory process to compel the attendance of witnesses in his behalf; whether he has been held to answer for any criminal offense without due process of law, and whether he be denied the right of bail as provided in said act.

Also, whether any oath of allegiance be now required of any such inhabitant of the Philippine Islands to be taken beyond the limits of said islands as a condition of being released from imprisonment, or of being permitted to return thereto; and, if so, by what authority said oath of allegiance is required.

Mr. HOAR. The resolution is in substance one inquiring what government now exists in the island of Guam, by what executive department that government is now administered, and especially by what authority and upon what charge Mabini is there detained and imprisoned. That is the whole substance of the resolution. As it is a long resolution, and therefore some Senator may desire to see it, I ask that it may go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think there will be objection from any quarter to it.

HIRAM C. WALKER.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask leave, on account of the fact that I am out of the Chamber most of the time now in committee, to call up the bill (H. R. 6326) for the relief of Hiram C. Walker. It is a little bill correcting the record of an old soldier whom I have known for many years, and who is a very good citizen and is very poor. I should like to have the bill passed so that he may be able to get the relief he is entitled to receive.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to remove the charge of absence without leave from the name of Hiram C. Walker, late first lieutenant of Company C, Tenth Regiment Illinois Cavalry, and to issue to him an honorable discharge to date from June 18, A. D. 1863.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the act (S. 1099) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to return to Harvard University certain colors, silver cup, and Nordenfelt gun.

ANTHRACITE COAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted on the 5th instant by Mr. VEST, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to prepare and report a bill amending "An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States," approved July 24, 1897, so that the tariff duty shall be removed from anthracite coal and the same be placed on the free list.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, this resolution has been discussed two or three days in the morning hour, and the mere mention of any change in our present tariff schedules has caused the Senator who is recognized as the leader of his party on protection in this Chamber to become more strenuous and to exhibit more animation and feeling and eloquence than I thought that Senator capable of. In my long and pleasant service with him here (and I do not use that word in any perfunctory sense, because I have great regard for the Senator from Rhode Island) I have never seen him exhibit the same degree of earnestness or rise to such flights of eloquence as he has evinced in the discussion of this little, simple, innocent resolution.

I shall discuss the situation with which this resolution deals, not from the standpoint of a free trader, not from the standpoint of a Democrat, other than that I could not occupy any other point of view, but I shall endeavor to put aside partisanship, to sink and to put behind me any feelings of party advantage which might arise from a clearer and better understanding of the situation by the American people.

If the suffering caused by the inability of the people to get one of the main necessaries of life, coal, would only enter the homes and hovels of Democrats, and if the blizzard with its icy teeth would only bite the shivering limbs of Democrats, I could understand the callousness and the coldbloodedness of the Senators on the other side in putting above all considerations of humanity and patriotism the maintenance of the sacredness of the Dingley tariff law. But, fortunately or unfortunately, the American people must share alike in the good and ill fortune which comes to them from their own blunders and mistakes and from the failure of their representatives to do what is right and proper here. We can not divorce in our common every-day life the results and effects of legislation so as to let the bad fall on those who are opposed to good, and the good go to those only who are in favor of it. We who are innocent of any complicity in the criminal folly can not "sprinkle our doorposts" or mark them so the angel of death may pass by and not enter, but we must suffer with those who are alone responsible.

The situation is one unparalleled in the history of this country. We read every day of this and that person having been frozen to death. But while the mortality owing to the coal famine is very small, relatively speaking, the consequence is in planting the seeds of disease—of pneumonia, consumption, and other ailments—which will leave a long death roll behind them. This view is the one which should press itself upon us and force us, if need be, to take whatever action is necessary to begin reform, to commence some practical programme of relief to the people.

The tariff on coal cuts very little figure. The 67 cents a ton which is paid by foreign coal coming into our country is of little moment, outside of the New England cities and those regions of our country which are near to Canada. The stock of coal available for import is so small because there has been no foresight or expectancy that there would be a market in the United States for the importation of coal. We are exporters of coal, and in normal conditions there could be absolutely no benefit to the American people from this resolution if it became a law. The coal producers of bituminous and anthracite can supply the home market in competition with the world, and except in a very few localities where, by reason of nearness to Canadian mines, there might be a small amount of coal imported the general situation remains that the tariff is not of much moment one way or the other.

I understand from the papers, and the Senator from Rhode Island has informed us, that efforts of relief would be made elsewhere than in this Chamber; that it was the desire and purpose of his party in the House—where they have the majority—to originate legislation which would give this relief. While I shall not enter upon the discussion as to whether it amounts to much where the measure for relief originates, I will only say in passing that if the House shall send us a measure looking to the removal of the duty on coal or its suspension for a year, so far as I know nobody on this side will hesitate to pass it, though we all know that this Congress has been in session over a month and nothing has been done with the recommendation of the President. If any credit is due anywhere for its passage it will be due to the venerable and brilliant Senator from Missouri, whose resolution has precipitated this debate and called attention to this particular phase of the coal famine. His eloquence and his presentation of the condition have put the spur to the lagging horses in the other end of the Capitol and to those at this end who have been cold-bloodedly contemplating the condition; and if any movement is made it will be by reason of the resolution of the Senator from Missouri.

If we had no duty on coal, it is probable that there might be some larger importations and preparation made by the coal miners abroad and in Canada to enter into competition, because it is well understood that the fact that there is a tariff and that the American producers can compete and drive the foreigner out of the market has hitherto made foreigners unwilling to make any efforts in that direction.

Mr. President, I shall not enter upon any further discussion or portrayal of the wrong done our people and of the robbery that is now being perpetrated upon them. The newspapers are filled every day with these harrowing stories of suffering and misery and death. The wonder is that other communities have not followed the lead of that little town in Illinois—Arcola, I believe—where the coal held by a monopolist was seized by the citizens and distributed without regard to party among those who were suffering because of the lack of fuel. The wonder is that in this trying time of distress and death other mobs elsewhere are not taking steps to teach a lesson to the recreant Congressmen and Senators here, as well as to show the monopolists that in the last resort men will neither starve nor freeze to death, but will throttle the law and take it into their own hands.

This danger which now confronts us, which is upon us, which has enveloped us, has been foreseen, and warnings have been uttered, warnings authoritative in their nature, warnings coming from nonpartisan bodies and the nonpartisan commission appointed by this very Senate and the other House of Congress. We have known that the impending calamity was liable to come at any moment whenever the monopoly which has been gradually reaching out and inclosing in its grasp the anthracite coal fields should complete its work. Recommendations have been made, efforts to have the law officers of the United States Government go into the courts and to prevent this consolidation and the completion of the monopoly. Everything has been done except to attract the attention of the masses to the fact that they were being betrayed here by their servants and that this body, charged directly with taking care of the public and the interests of the people, was derelict; that it was in collusion with those who are seeking to monopolize the necessaries of life and to levy improper and wrongful toll upon the very staff of life and everything else.

It is said by those charged with the administration of the Government that we need more legislation; that we have not now any remedy for the evils which confront us; that the people are helpless; that Congress must do more; that the officers of the law are powerless, and their efforts will be futile to render relief. I am reminded here of an old and hackneyed couplet which all of us have heard so often and so long that most of us fail to give it its full import. I think it is from Pope, but it does not matter who wrote it; it is as true now as it ever was:

> For forms of government let fools contest;
> Whate'er is best administer'd is best.

We may load down our statutes with law after law and pass all the flood of bills that are coming in now from both ends of the Capitol, and unless the sworn officers of the law shall discharge their duties fearlessly and honestly, every effort to protect the people will fail, as the efforts which have been made in the past have failed, because of the dereliction of duty on the part of those charged with executing the law.

I am loath, being a mere layman, having never been in court except as a juror, to undertake to discuss legal questions in this presence. I know that I am but a stripling, so to speak, in the presence of a dozen Goliaths each one of whom in his panoply of mail would trip me up on legal questions.

But, relying on my common sense and my ability to interpret words, I shall endeavor to show that we have on the statute books law enough to have prevented this disaster, and law enough to deal with it now.

On July 2, 1890, Congress passed what is known as the Sherman antitrust law, and I propose in my feeble and humble way to analyze two or three sections of that act. Then I propose to refer to the opinions of judges of our Supreme Court and others of our leading judges in regard to certain provisions of this act. Then I shall rehearse some of the things which have been done under this act. Section 1 of that act reads:

SECTION 1. Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal.

Then comes the punitive clause providing the punishment of fine and imprisonment upon every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy, and so on.

Section 2 is far more drastic, far more sweeping, and covers almost everything. It provides:

SEC. 2. Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize, any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Note the far-reaching effect of this statute interpreted by an honest judge, who wanted to protect the people:

Every person who shall monopolize or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part—

Not the whole, but "any part"— of the trade or commerce among the several States, etc.

I shall produce evidence before I get through going to prove the existence of a monopoly which, if not complete, has so far covered the anthracite coal production as to reach the enormous percentage of above 95. Efforts have been made, proof has been filed, pleadings have been had, petitions presented to the Attorney-General, warning him and begging him to take steps to protect the people against the impending danger which has fallen upon them. But he has sat quietly in his office and done nothing.

There is still another provision of this law which is very, very drastic. Section 6 reads:

SEC. 6. Any property owned under any contract or by any combination, or pursuant to any conspiracy (and being the subject thereof) mentioned in section 1 of this act, and being in the course of transportation from one State to another, or to a foreign country, shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized and condemned by like proceedings as those provided by law for the forfeiture, seizure, and condemnation of property imported into the United States contrary to law.

Here we not only have provision made in the plainest language possible and interpreted by the courts in a way which would give the judges jurisdiction and authority by injunction to stop it, but also provision to confiscate all property of that character on the cars, loaded for interstate commerce; and yet the poor people today are shivering in their homes, and even the wealthy are shivering in their dwellings, because of the fact that the monopoly does exist; and it exists by reason of the fact that the law officers have failed to interpret the law in the interest of the people.

So we have the spectacle presented of a monopoly in broad daylight levying tribute to the amount of hundreds of millions of dollars upon the starving poor and upon the common, every day masses, and the cry is, "We can not do anything; we are unable under existing statutes to protect the people, and therefore we must have Congress give us more power; we must have another commission to deal with this trust question." We have a commission now somewhere dawdling along, pretending to investigate the situation, and taking an enormous mass of irrelevant and unnecessary testimony, when, if they wanted to go to the root of the coal question, they could find out about this combination and monopoly and report back here to us if such a monopoly exists, how it came about, and suggest a remedy, or leave it to us to either throttle it or continue to do nothing ourselves.

Now it is proposed to have another commission created—commissions and commissions—"how not to do it," rather than how to do it; to sift sand in the eyes of the people; to deceive them by specious pleas and the making of sophistical speeches based on air, and to do nothing. But let labor make any move in the direction of any conspiracy or combination whatsoever; let a dozen miners get together and make an agreement among themselves as to what shall be done about the rates they shall receive for their work, and immediately some attorney of a corporation will hurry to some supple-kneed judge—I do not know whether "supple-kneed" is right; perhaps it should be "supple-brained" or both—and an injunction issues at once prohibiting any and every thing that will interfere with the business of these wealthy capitalists who own the property that is in risk.

Hundreds of injunctions have been issued from the courts under their equity jurisdiction; they have been as thick as "leaves in Vallombrosa;" but when an attempt is made to get an injunction against the coal trust the Attorney-General becomes blind; he can not see and he will not hear.

Mr. DIETRICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. DIETRICH. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina if he were Attorney-General what would he do to relieve the situation?

Mr. TILLMAN. If I had been the Attorney-General in October last, when this condition of facts or the impending condition was called to his attention, and probable evidence, almost unanswerable evidence, furnished to show that this thing was coming, I should have gone to some judge somewhere, if I could have found one honest enough—and I think there are plenty of them; I hope so, at least—who would have granted an injunction dissolving this combination, and then, if they had not obeyed my order, if I were a judge, I should have done as Judge Woods did.

Mr. DIETRICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. DIETRICH. Supposing you had done that and that the miners had again gone out on a strike and had refused to mine coal, then what would you have done?

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, I can not answer irrelevant, suppositious questions like that. You could consume the balance of the day in asking questions which have no actual bearing on the situation. Of course we can not make the miners work; but the miners were starving and willing and anxious to work on any fair and decent terms. Any such supposition could not enter the brain of anybody but a lunatic.

Mr. DIETRICH. Would the bringing in of coal free of duty be conducive to the increase of the wages of the miners?

Mr. TILLMAN. You have got off on the tariff now, and I did not expect to discuss that. I have already dismissed that. But I do not believe that bringing in coal free would have had anything to do with the wages of the miners in the United States. When we export coal, and have been exporting it for years, in the name of common sense how can any tariff on it affect the miners' wages here at home? I ask the Senator that question. [A pause.] The Senator does not care to answer, and I will proceed with my argument.

Mr. DIETRICH. Will the Senator please repeat the question?

Mr. TILLMAN. I asked the Senator, in a community or in a State where coal is exported by the hundreds of thousands of tons, because we mine more coal than we can consume at home and have the largest coal fields in the world, how can the tariff on coal protect the miner to the extent of increasing his wages?

Mr. DIETRICH. I will answer the Senator by asking him a question.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh! I am ready to hear the Senator's question.

Mr. DIETRICH. With coal selling at from ten to twenty dollars a ton, would that prevent coal from being brought here upon which there is a duty of only 67 cents a ton?

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course not. But what has that got to do with the miners' wages? Are the miners getting all or any of the benefit of this ten or twenty dollars a ton now? Are they not, according to the testimony, being paid the very same scale of wages which obtained before the rise in prices was brought about?

Now, to return to the point I was going to discuss when interrupted.

Mr. President, I propose to be entirely fair to the Attorney-General. I would be very glad, indeed, if his utterances and actions would enable me to believe that he is sincere, and that he is really acting according to the best lights before him. We have had printed during the last week the opinion of the Attorney-General and his suggestions to the Judiciary Committee, accompanied by a résumé of the cases which have been tried under the antitrust law, a brief synopsis of decisions and the pending litigation, accompanied also by a speech of the Attorney-General delivered at Pittsburg last October. These set out in detail Mr. Knox's views and opinions. It is to be presumed if that official is not sufficiently on record and is not ready to stand by the record that he himself has made, then he has been very unfortunate in sending these documents here.

I will first give the Attorney-General's position or his ideas on trusts. He says:

Because they are great and prosperous is no sufficient reason for their destruction. If that greatness and prosperity are not the result of the defiance of the natural rights or recorded will of the people, there is no just cause of complaint.

That there are evils and abuses in trust promotions, purposes, organizations, methods, management, and effects none questions except those who have profited by those evils. That all or any of these abuses are to be found in every large organization called a trust no one would assert who valued his reputation for sane judgment.

The Attorney-General takes the position here, if I interpret his language correctly—and some of his friends will tell me if I interpret it incorrectly or contrary to common sense—that there are good trusts and bad ones, and that the very fact of the existence of a trust does not carry with it the necessity that that trust shall affect the country injuriously. He goes on to give the conspicuous and noxious features in respect to trusts. He says:

Overcapitalization, lack of publicity of operation, discrimination in prices to destroy competition, insufficient personal responsibility of officers and directors for corporate management, tendency to monopoly, and lack of appreciation in their management of their relations to the people, for whose benefit they are permitted to exist.

Here he is again:

The end desired by the overwhelming majority of the people of all sections of the country is that combinations of capital should be regulated and not destroyed, and that measures should be taken to correct the tendency toward monopolization of the industrial business of the country. I assume a thing to be avoided, even by suggestion, is legislation regulating the business interests of the country beyond such as will accomplish this end.

Now, listen here, please; and I am sorry that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] is going away, because I wanted to call his attention to an indirect reference to the tariff.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I have not gone away.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh! I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he had gone into the cloakroom; I thought I was lacking in interest and that he had got tired. Now, I want the Senator to take this home with him and pray over it. [Laughter.]

In my judgment, a monopoly in any industry would be impossible in this country, where money is abundant and cheap and in the hands or within the reach of keen and capable men, if competition were assured of a fair and open field and protected against unfair, artificial, and discriminating practices.

Of course we have high authority, financial authority, that "the tariff is the mother of trusts;" and it would be very difficult in the school of logic—and this logician whom I am quoting adds only strength to my own ideas and arguments—it would be impossible before any honest jury to present the claim that the tariff does not give the beneficiaries of it in this country a monopoly to the extent that their foreign competitors must pay, first, the cost of production in the foreign country; secondly, the charges of transportation, and thirdly, the tariff duty, before competition is established. When we see, as we have seen, almost everything that we use in our daily life in the way of manufactured products come to be controlled by American manufacturers because of the fact of the destruction of this very competition which the Attorney-General mentions, we are face to face with the inevitable corollary that the tariff has produced that monopoly in the home market. It may be very good; in some respects it has been good.

I am sufficiently an American, with broad enough views, I hope, to take in all my country rather than the little corner of it in which I was born and to believe that it is for the best interests of this country as a whole to manufacture everything it consumes, if it can be done at anything like a reasonable price, in competition with the foreigner; and if it is necessary, a protective duty, or a duty which would at least put the home producer, the home manufacturer, on an equality with his foreign competitor, would be permissible and proper. Such a tariff would be a revenue tariff inevitably. In that position I differ somewhat from some of my colleagues; but my difference one way or the other does not cut any figure. I am in a hopeless minority here. I come from a section which has been time out of mind the pillaged section of this Union. I suppose, having gotten used to being robbed, we will have to continue in that unpleasant condition; but I must go on or I will get off on the tariff, which I promised not to do.

The Attorney-General further says:

Two or more persons or corporations can not by any combination or arrangement between themselves either contract or expand the rights of others to engage in a similar business. The utmost they can do is to discourage the disposition to do so by restricting the opportunities, or by securing to themselves some exclusive facilities or the enjoyment of some common facilities upon exclusive terms.

That is a very meaty paragraph, and brings into view a whole cloud of witnesses and evidence to show that two corporations conspiring together, the one in the production of petroleum and its products and the other in the transportation of petroleum and its products, have brought about a domestic monopoly in this country, which to-day stands as a monument to the genius of the men who have organized it and as a monument to the rascality, the cowardice, and the venality of the men who could have stopped it and have not, and who could now stop it and will not.

Mr. Knox says:

If the law will guarantee to the small producer protection against piratical methods in competition and keep the highways to the markets open and available to him for the same tolls charged to his powerful competitor, he will manage to live and thrive to an astonishing degree.

Of course he will. But when Mr. Knox himself is charged with the duty of seeing that this is done he sits quietly in his office, or goes up and down the country making speeches, claiming his inability or his helplessness to give relief.

Now, here is a remarkable statement, and I want the legal minds on the other side of the Chamber to please grasp it and help me, if possible, to understand it.

In many cases of departure by a carrier from its published tariffs, the favored shipper has enjoyed his advantage for so long a time that all rivals have disappeared. In such cases, and they are the most numerous—

He goes on to discuss now the very question which I have just mentioned—the favored shipper has enjoyed his advantage for so long a time that all rivals have disappeared. In such cases, and they are the most numerous—

Now he is speaking of his own knowledge, apparently—no illegal discrimination exists; consequently the recipient of the unlawful rebates escapes the penalties of the act to regulate commerce.

Of course he does; but when he escapes punishment under the act to regulate commerce, and the Attorney-General is unable, under the interpretation of that act by the Supreme Court, to give relief to the shippers that are discriminated against, he fails to realize that the second section of the Sherman antitrust law reaches its long arm out around these creatures, and that if he would set in motion the enginery of law with which he is armed, and which it is made his duty to enforce by that second section, he would seize upon these very discriminators and punish them.

These very people who give favored rates and rebates have entered into a conspiracy, evidently, and the evidence has been piled up before the Interstate Commerce Committee in its hearings, and in the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to show discrimination—a discrimination regardless of the wanton breaking of the law, which in some of these cases has become so common that one of the great railroad presidents said that if all the violators of certain sections of the interstate-commerce law were put in prison there would not be jails enough to hold them.

I will quote from Mr. Knox again. He says:

In such cases, and they are the most numerous, no illegal discrimination exists.

Because a monopoly has been fostered to the point where it has absolute control of the commerce in a given article so far as railroads are concerned, and by means of this discrimination there are no competitors, he claims that there is no violation of law, notwithstanding that the monopoly was created by violation of the law and stands to-day as a monument of the worthlessness of a statute which is not enforced by an honest official.

Now comes Mr. Knox again on the antitrust law. He has been discussing the interstate-commerce law. He says:

In other words, the antitrust law applies to every agreement in restraint of interstate trade, whether made by corporations or individuals.

In the next place the court held that any agreement or combination which directly restrains not only the manufacture but the sale of a commodity among the several States comes within the antitrust law.

He acknowledges that there are conditions where the antitrust law applies, but when its application to the condition of facts which now exists is brought before him he fails to carry out his own conception of the powers that are vested in him, and comes to Congress, through the Judiciary Committee and through the recommendations of the President, asking for an enlargement of power, for the assistance of a commission to aid him, for more statutes to rust on the statute books, because unless the Attorney-General wants to do something you can never put enough law into any book or a hundred books to give the people relief. Speaking of the antitrust law, he says:

It was commonly supposed at the time of the passage of this act that its provisions forbade the existence of trusts that were engaged in monopolizing the production throughout the country of various articles of general consumption, and the Government shared in this view.

It was commonly supposed, he says, when the act was passed, that it did apply; that it did mean something; that it had a threat and a power to punish when law was broken.

Then he goes on and gives a brief recital of some of the litigation, beginning with the Knight case, the sugar-trust case, in which the court held that that monopoly was merely manufacture; that it did not necessarily enter into interstate commerce, although it would be very difficult to see why people should pile up millions and millions of pounds of sugar merely for the sake of manufacturiug it. But the Supreme Court, staying within safe limits, declared that manufacturers did not come within the scope of the antitrust law, and protected the sugar trust; and while it is an open secret that no effort was made to show that the product had entered into interstate commerce and was then entering and was intended to enter (and to that extent the district attorney failed to present his case for the Government in a proper light), there were cases subsequently in which the Government showed its hand, and its mailed hand, to these malefactors and stopped their wrongdoing.

He speaks here of the Addyston pipe combination, and Senators or others who are interested would do well to give heed to the opinion of Judge Taft in that case—Judge Taft, who is now in the Philippines; Judge Taft, who has given notice that his sense of public duty will not allow him to accept the high position on the Supreme Bench, for which he was booked, and that he remains out yonder in the discharge of an arduous, if an odious, duty. It may not be odious to him. I do not want to get off on our imperialistic programme this morning. I am not going to enter that switch. But I want you to read the decision of Judge Taft and the common-law doctrine which he elucidates so forcibly and unanswerably to sustain the contention that any monopoly or any attempt at monopoly in restraint of trade which extends to interstate commerce is within the jurisdiction of the antitrust law and that it is the duty of the Government to move to put down such conspiracies.

Let us see what Attorney-General Knox himself says about the common-law doctrine. I want to get through with my quotations from this interesting pamphlet of the Attorney-General. While it may not be entirely relevant to my argument just now, I put it in here in justice to him lest I forget it. But Attorney-General Knox says in regard to the common law:

> Primarily it is for the Congress to decide whether it has the power, and whether and to what extent it will execute it; what character of restraints, whether all or those only which are unreasonable and injurious shall fall under the ban; whether legislation in the first instance should extend to all commerce or only to commerce in articles of vital importance to the people.

Now, listen:

> The time never was when the English-speaking people permitted the articles necessary for their existence to be monopolized or controlled, and all devices to that end found condemnation in the body of their laws. The great English judges pronounced that such manifestations of human avarice required no statute to declare their unlawfulness; that they were crimes against common law—that is, against common right.
> It is difficult to improve upon the great unwritten code known as the common law. Under its salutary guaranties and restraints the English-speaking people have attained their wealth and power. It condemns monopoly and contracts in restraint of trade as well. The distinction, however, between restraints that are reasonable in view of all the circumstances and those which are unreasonable is recognized and has been followed in this country by the courts.

Discussing that phase of this subject. I want to point out that in the decision of the Supreme Court in the Debs case, while Judge Woods, the circuit judge who had issued the injunction against Debs, based it on the antitrust law, the Supreme Court declared that he had jurisdiction and that it was his duty to act in the premises; that is, under the statement of facts presented to him, because of a broader foundation and a wider power than the antitrust law gave. I have Judge Woods's opinion here and I have the Supreme Court's opinion here, but I do not propose at this stage to indulge in quotations from the Supreme Court or from the other judges.

I wish to call attention to the fact that in speaking so eloquently of the common law as he has done it should be understood that the Attorney-General arms those of us who contend that the antitrust statute must be interpreted in the light of the common law, as the Supreme Court has declared, and that therefore the strict letter of that statute, if it be unequal to the emergency, would be strengthened by the general principles of law known as the common law, and that all of these combinations and monopolies are contrary to law, illegal, null, and void, because they are contrary to the general doctrine of public welfare, and therefore if there would be any straining of the law, if the Attorney-General wanted to stretch his power and reach his hand beyond the statutory authority, he has ample provision, ample opportunity, ample authority in the decisions of the courts in regard to the exercise of the judicial hand in the various cases which have been brought under the antitrust law.

Before I leave Mr. Knox—and I do not know that I shall leave him at all, because he is what you lawyers call the delictum, from my point of view; he is the criminal whom I am indicating, the man blamable, primarily or secondarily, for all this misery and wrong and suffering, because he has failed to do his duty—I want to call attention to a peculiar phase of our national evolution.

Mr. DIETRICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TILLMAN. I will in one minute. [A pause.] I had better yield now. I am just beginning on the other subject. So go ahead.

Mr. DIETRICH. I wish to ask the Senator from South Carolina if he is as positive now that Attorney-General Knox is to blame for this condition as he was when he stated in 1896 that the distress, poverty, and hunger which prevailed in the winter of 1894–95 were due to the money question?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I have hunted rabbits in my time, and I have hunted 'possums, and I recollect once when I was a small boy going out with a good old darky on my mother's farm—plantation, as we called it—one moist night, sort of half moonlight, when there was not any need of a torch, to hunt 'possums. We had one of the best 'possum dogs that ever barked on anybody's branch, and whenever he opened his mouth I could see my old darky friend's mouth begin to water, because he had in view the feast that was to be his when the baked 'possum and taters came on the table next day. On the special night I speak of, after a good long walk through the pines and up and down and around where the 'possums were accustomed to go, we heard the old dog, who had seemed a little crestfallen and more or less lacking in strenuosity, and had been unwilling, seemingly, to exercise himself much and move about in that lively way which was his custom. Having left us for a time and disappeared, presently we heard him bark.

We freshened up ourselves. We were getting a little sleepy by that time, because it was beyond 10 o'clock. We heard in the distance the hound's voice, and presently we heard him give that well-known, deep-throated bark which indicates that a dog has bayed. In other words, he has his quarry up a tree. The difference in the tone would not be recognized by any but one accustomed to hunting, but every person who has been in the country in his boyhood and has indulged in any kind of sport like that, where dogs bay, will know to what I am alluding. We heard the old hound bay and we hurried forward, and when we got to him we found that he had barked up a small gum tree and that he was rearing up on it, throwing his paws up, and barking loudly. We looked—and there was sufficient moon for us to see anything—and there was not anything up that tree. The old hound had made a mistake, and that darky friend of mine said: "Come, Buddy; come, let us go home. Old Red has gone to running 'haunts,' and we will not catch any more 'possums to-night."

I am not running haunts to-day, I will say to my honored friend, the Senator from Nebraska, and I am not discussing what caused the misery in 1893 and 1894 and 1895, but I will say to him in a general and a very brief and pointed way that the tariff, which is said to have been the cause of all that misery, was not enacted until after the panic had come; that the so-called Democrat who was elected that year found, when he entered the White House, that orders by President Harrison had been issued in preparation for the issue of new bonds to maintain the gold standard; and that the acts of Mr. Cleveland in carrying out the Republican programme, without change or variation, without altering the helm of state one-tenth of a degree, only helped bring on what had already started, and that was an avalanche of ruin and hunger and lack of work from conditions which had grown up under your own Republican tariff law, and which was most miserable and horrible. God Almighty, or the devil, owed the Southern people, or the Democratic party, a grudge and paid it off in Grover Cleveland! And owing to his mistakes and blunders and treacheries the Democratic party gets all the credit for all that which would have come any way had you remained in power. I hope you are not going to leave. [Laughter.] I mean I hope the Senator from Nebraska has not got enough.

Mr. President, I have pointed out in a fair way, as I think, what Attorney-General Knox has said, and his interpretation and recommendations in regard to trusts. If any Senator can suggest wherein I have been unfair, or have done him wrong, or have failed to quote what might be to his credit, I will gladly insert it here and now.

In regard to these suits which Mr. Knox has brought—the suit to prevent the merger of the Northwestern railroads, the Northern Securities Company case, I believe, is the title, and the suit against the beef trust, and one or two others—I note a peculiar condition, a remarkable situation, to which in passing I will merely call the attention of the country and such Senators as are doing me the honor to listen to me.

Mr. Knox had a predecessor in the Attorney-General's Office, and it is a matter of record that during the two years or such matter while Mr. Griggs was Attorney-General never was a case brought under the antitrust law. He said he could do nothing, and he never even tried. But after he left that office, and after he was succeeded by the present incumbent, we find that in the very cases which have been brought by the present Attorney-General to restrain trusts and monopolies and combinations, and they are only two or three, the lawyer employed by those monopolies and combinations to thwart the Government is the very gentleman who was his predecessor as Attorney-General and who has only recently left the Department. In other words, we have the remarkable spectacle in jurisprudence of a man, the trusted officer and servant of the people, the man in a high official place, charged with a certain duty, remaining in that office quiescent and innocuous to his friends, but most harmful to the people, getting in full touch and obtaining all the information necessary to arm him with any facts that might be known privately to the Department of Justice, then going out and the very first time the Government attempts to move along the lines which he himself had declared to be unprofitable and useless he appears to argue the case on the other side.

And that is not the only case. He has appeared three or four times in these efforts on the part of the States and on the part of the National Government to bring these monopolies and these combinations and trusts to book. It is his business as a lawyer, it will be said. Yes; it is his business as a lawyer, but for the honor of the profession—and I do honor it, notwithstanding the number of shysters and scoundrels who are in it and who disgrace it—I will say that I have never known in all my reading an instance in which an ex officer of the Government was so brazen, had so much impudence, had so little regard for the decencies and proprieties of life, as to appear in a case against his successor and against the very Government which he had served or pretended to serve; he certainly drew the salary.

There is one instance, not in legal jurisprudence but in poetry. Admirers of Byron will recall that biting but most brilliant of his satires, The Vision of Judgment, in which is portrayed the death of George III and his appearance at the gates of heaven, knocking for admission; the trial that was had outside in the open air, not within the sacred precincts, with St. Peter as judge and with Beelzebub as attorney, claiming the corpus delictum as belonging to his jurisdiction and to his dominion, while Michael was sent down the pearly gates opened, and the archangel appeared to defend and claim jurisdiction of the case in behalf of his master, to determine whether or not this old blind decrepit tyrant was entitled to enter heaven. And Byron describing the scene (the poem is possibly the wittiest, as I said, if not the most brilliant of anything he ever wrote in the way of satire) speaks about the meeting of Satan and Michael, formerly high spirits in heaven, archangels, one of whom had been cast out by reason of his rebellion, and the other remaining loyal.

These two former confederates and associates meet to try the case whether or not George III is entitled to enter heaven. I had it in my mind to bring the book here and to read ten or twelve stanzas, because it would probably be the most interesting part of my speech. But here is a prototype. It is not exactly analogous, for the reason that this was merely a contest between a fallen angel and one who still held this high estate. I will not characterize Mr. Griggs as a fallen angel; I do not think he ever was an angel at all. He has no wings. But at present we must, for the sake of the allegory, say that the Attorney-General is an angel and that Griggs, in his attitude of antagonism to the Government which has honored him, is a fallen spirit; and here is what Byron says about that other meeting:

> The spirits were in neutral space, before
> The gate of heaven; like eastern thresholds is
> The place where death's grand cause is argued o'er
> And souls dispatch'd to that world or to this;
> And therefore Michael and the other wore
> A civil aspect—

They had only recently been at war. I will say recently; that was the last time they had met. It may have been a thousand years or a million years. We do not know anything about that. There is no time in heaven, we are told. Therefore I used the word "recently" possibly wrongly.

> And therefore Michael and the other wore
> A civil aspect though they did not kiss,
> Yet still between His Darkness and His Brightness
> There pass'd a mutual glance of great politeness.

And no doubt when Mr. Griggs, who graduated into the Attorney-General's office from the position as attorney of the combined coal railroads, as I am informed, this very trust which is causing all this misery, was confronted by Mr. Knox, who graduated into his office after having served corporations all his life, and was once the attorney of the Carnegie Company—no doubt when they met to determine whether or not the antitrust law was mere language or whether it had anything of force and power to restrain wrong and punish it, they failed to kiss, but undoubtedly they winked at each other, Knox saying to Griggs: "I will do just as little harm as I can, and you keep me from doing all the harm you can." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, having, as I think, been fair in trying to state the Attorney-General's position and giving him due credit for all he has done, I come to that part of his official career where I propose to indict him for having failed to do what he ought to have done and what he could have done; what the law said he should have done and the people who are interested endeavored to have him do.

For the purposes of my argument, I want to take up the subject of the coal combination, of the coal trust—of the organization, creation, manipulation, and ownership of the coal output in the anthracite region. Fortunately we have at hand a very valuable collection of testimony and evidence.

Two or three years ago—I do not recall the exact date—this body had a desire to give the children something to play with, to relieve the tension in the minds of the laboring classes as to the fact that they were ignored in this House, and at both ends of it. An agitation sprung up in regard to the creation of a nonpartisan, nonpolitical commission which would examine into all conflicts between capital and labor, examine the whole field of our industrial life and report to us its conclusions and recommendations. The Industrial Commission, composed of men of the highest character, many of them experts along certain lines with which the Commission had to deal, have made their report, and that final report was published last February—it being their summing up. Senators who want to follow me can get the nineteenth volume of the Industrial Commission's report and read it, if they want to.

I come to the statement of Mr. Phillips, his independent statement, because he would not join his fellows in all of their theories or their deductions. It is found on page 653 of volume 19:

> From the investigations of the commission it is apparent that the most potent factor in establishing and maintaining monopolies has been preferential or discriminating rates of freight by common carriers given by rebates or otherwise. One of our oldest monopolies, though not nominally in the hands of a single corporation or trust, is that which controls anthracite coal. This business furnishes a conclusive proof of the power of the railroads through discriminating rates to establish a monopoly.
> The facts with respect to this have been very clearly brought out in the report of the Industrial Commission on Transportation. Mr. H. G. Brooks, an independent coal operator of Pennsylvania, testifies (Vol. XII, p. 163) that 43,000,000 tons of anthracite coal are yearly carried by rail to market at three-fourths cent per ton per mile in excess of the rates charged for carrying bituminous coal. This is—

Now listen:

> This is $322,500 per mile of excess charge for the year's product, or $46,762,500 annually for the average haul of 145 miles to the general market, or over $1 a ton.

They charge that excess as a difference between anthracite and bituminous coal.

> This overcharge, which is greater every year than the interest on our national debt, is made possible by the railroad monopoly, now euphoniously called "community of interests," and by the limited area of the hard coal supply. By discriminating against independent operators the railroads have forced them to sell their properties, until, at the present time, more than nine-tenths of the anthracite coal deposits is owned, and more than three-fourths of the entire yearly product is mined by eight lines of railroad that are substantially in entire union of interests. The report of this Commission summarizes the situation in this paragraph (Vol. XIX, p. 463).

This is the summing up of the entire Commission:

> On the basis of all this evidence it appears that the trend toward consolidation by actual purchase, not only of one railroad by another, but of independent coal holdings by the railroads, together with the extension of the community of ownership idea, is unmistakable. It can not be long before the anthracite coal business of the United States, in all its enormous extent and commercial value, will be entirely monopolized by a few powerful financial interests. The only safeguard for the public against exorbitant prices must be found either in the competition of other fuels, in enlightened self-interest on the part of the railroads, or in the immediate application of governmental regulation. Competition between either the producers of anthracite coal or the railroads which transport their product can no longer be regarded as of the slightest effect.

Did the Attorney-General know these things? If not, why not? Where is that watchful statesmanship of which we heard so much yesterday in the eloquent speech of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], that foresight, that wisdom, which looked ahead and minimized the harm by action?

The evidence is cumulative. I readily foresee however that I will have to stop this siren song directly and give way to the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], who has given notice of a speech at 2 o'clock, and, as I know from my experience, when a man has prepared some slight "remarks" to deliver in this body, if he does not get his speech off on schedule it is liable to cause indigestion, mental or otherwise.

I realize that I shall have to postpone until another day a continuation of this interesting topic. But I feel sure that the people who are shivering, the people who are freezing, the people who have voted to send us here, who are crying aloud with their upraised hands, "Help us!" "Protect us!" want to hear as much of this as may be necessary to satisfy their own minds whether or not my contention is true; that the cause of all this suffering and wrong and misery and robbery to-day lies at the door of that officer of this Government whose sworn duty it is to enforce the antitrust act, and who may be, and is, in my judgment, and will be, I believe, in the judgment of every honest mind who will examine all this evidence, solely responsible, except insomuch as he has been hampered or restrained or ordered by his superior not to act.

It is a very good place for me to stop, although I have seven more minutes, and I will read a little more. I will get in some more of the evidence and let my brethren on the other side digest it. I read from the report of the same commission:

> The principal event connected with the attempted elimination of coal production independent of the transportation companies has consisted of the purchase of the Pennsylvania Coal Company by the Erie Railroad. This Pennsylvania Coal Company, as our map of the Wyoming region indicates, controls some of the most valuable properties in the heart of the richest field. Its production is not proportionately great, amounting to slightly less than 5 per cent of the total shipments for 1900. Its importance is due, rather, to the fact that its reserves for future production are great, and also that it was the largest of the single companies still independent of the railroads. Its independence has also in a measure been accentuated by the fact of its ownership of a connecting road, the Erie and Wyoming Valley, with an outlet at Hawley on the Erie system.

Some three years ago the independent operators who, as we have already seen, are most important in the northern field, projected an independent connecting railroad line, with a view to securing lower and more equable freight rates to tide water. The earliest of these attempts was frustrated by the purchase of many of the mines which had pledged tonnage to this road through the agency of the Temple Iron Company. A second attempt was also made to secure an outlet to tide water by the construction of a railroad following the abandoned Delaware and Hudson Canal to Kingston, on the Hudson River. The Pennsylvania Coal Company was an important factor in this enterprise. Thus, to the leading incentive of eliminating the most important of the independent operators by the purchase of the Pennsylvania Coal Company, was added the advantage arising from a frustration of this projected construction of an independent railroad to tide water. The opposition of the established railroads to any such attempt at new construction was manifested also by the New York, Ontario and Western Railway, which proceeded to buy up all the independent operators who had agreed to ship over this new road in case it were built.

The purchase of the Pennsylvania Coal Company was made by the Erie Railroad through the mediation of the banking house of J. P. Morgan & Co. Agents traversed the entire northeastern region of Pennsylvania for months, purchasing shares in the coal company for whatever price was necessary in order to give control. The company had been paying about 16 per cent dividends, and with a capital of $5,000,000 had accumulated a surplus of twice that amount, so that the price asked for the stock was obviously not low. It is reported that the average price paid by J. P. Morgan & Co. was $552 a share. This property, when purchased, was then turned over to the Erie Railroad in return for $32,000,000 of 4 per cent fifty-year collateral trust bonds, secured by the property of the Pennsylvania Coal Company and also by the New York, Susquehanna and Western Railroad Company, recently acquired by the Erie.

In addition to this, the plan provided for an issue of $5,000,000 of preferred stock. Criticism has been directed against this operation on the ground that the price paid by the Erie Railroad to J. P. Morgan & Co. was excessive. Testimony before the Industrial Commission indicates that this was in fact the highest price paid for such properties in the history of the business, judged on the basis not of acreage, but according to ton of output. On the basis of a similar valuation the coal lands of the Reading Company would be worth $125,000,000, as against a present estimate on the books of the company at the last reorganization of only $70,000,000.

I will pause here to comment by stating that if this was the last chance for competition, if it was closing out the independent operators and forever handcuffing the American consumers, we can understand why Mr. J. P. Morgan was willing to raise his sights and hand out the ducats. What man intent on power and wealth would not give a big price, if he already owned everything except a little corner where competition existed, to buy the remainder, so as to cause the consumers of anthracite coal throughout the United States to be helpless and to pay into his coffers whatever he might see fit to demand?

Just as we have seen that other captain of industry do, that monumental millionaire, John D. Rockefeller, who is now trying to buy his way into the Temple of Fame by large and ever-increasing contributions for the upbuilding of the great Northwestern University. Whenever he sees fit in the lavish generosity of his heart to get a spectacle before the people and have himself advertised, and have the sycophants who write editorials in our papers bow down and worship at his shrine and praise him as a great benefactor, he says he is going to give, or does give, two or two and a half or five million dollars, and a week or two afterwards, or a week or two before, orders go to his agents throughout the United States to put 2 or 3 cents more a gallon on kerosene, and he rakes in ten or fifteen million dollars out of the pockets of the laboring people of this country by reason of this monopoly, and then turns around and graciously gives back to the University of Chicago two and a half million. Oh, these multi-millionaires know how to advertise themselves and make others pay for it!

Mr. Morgan could well afford to give whatever price was asked in order to get this last remaining obstacle in the way of his complete absorption of the anthracite coal field and of those who are mining it; and the Attorney-General sits silently and looks on, squints his other eye, thinks about Brother Griggs in the past, thinks about what is going to come to him in the future, and says, "Well, the American people are such infernal fools they will never catch us."

Mr. President, I now yield to my friend from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], and I will resume to-morrow, I take it.

Mr. SPOONER. Then it will not do to have the resolution as it is now.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may go over and that I may have the floor to-morrow when it comes before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that it may go over holding its privileged place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina asks that the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri may go over retaining its place in the morning hour, and that he shall be entitled to the floor upon it to-morrow. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. QUAY. Of course that is not to interfere with the regular order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. TILLMAN. The statehood bill will come up at the expiration of the morning hour. I am the unfinished business upon the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] was the unfinished business upon the statehood bill.

STATEHOOD BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I gave notice that at this time I would make some remarks in support of the pending bill, and I have been expecting to do so, but the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] desires to address the Senate, and to accommodate him I yield the floor until after he shall have concluded his speech.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I am under obligations to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], who has kindly yielded that I may take up some thirty or forty minutes in the discussion of this bill before he enters upon the discussion of it, and I wish to assure the Senator that his courtesy is appreciated and that I will leave him a sufficient length of time to complete his speech before the usual hour of adjournment.

Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the most thorough discussion on the part of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] of this measure, and I shall not attempt in the least to traverse the same ground occupied by him in that discussion. I may say now that the remarks which I shall make will not be in conflict with any of the facts which he has brought out in his discussion. In fact, I believe, admitting everything that he has said, one can honestly and conscientiously arrive at a conclusion entirely out of harmony with the conclusion arrived at by the Senator from Minnesota.

I agree, Mr. President, that the uppermost thought in the mind of every person considering this subject should be the influence of his decision upon the country at large in the future and not at the present time, and that we should have in our mind the welfare of the country at large rather than the welfare of a single State or of two or three separate States.

Mr. President, the attitude one should assume toward either of the statehood propositions—the one to admit a single State, the other for the admission of three new States with a possibility or a fair probability of the admission of another in a few years—depends entirely upon the standpoint from which he views the case. He may have uppermost in his mind the effect of the one or the other measure upon the status of the balance of the Union under present conditions. He may have in view only the present and future interests of the States which are sought to be introduced and made a part of the nation under the provisions of either one of these bills, or he may have in view the effect of the favorable consideration of either measure upon the country as a whole and for all time.

In this discussion, Mr. President, I shall monopolize but a small portion of the field of debate, but I hope to clearly and concisely demonstrate my views and show that they present matters worthy the consideration of every man who will take a prospective rather than a retrospective view of the influence his decision may have upon the future welfare of the country as a whole. I purpose to discuss this matter from the standpoint of the equitable representation of every section of the country in the Congress of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, the most casual survey of a century and a half of national progress can not fail to impress everyone with the truth that we have drifted very far from those principles and policies with which we were initiated into the sisterhood of nations. With a facility and elasticity, possibly unexampled, we have easily adapted ourselves to new conditions and harmonized our policies with new and unforeseen surroundings.

With our attention ever riveted on the future, we are fast leaving behind us old traditional theories; sometimes adapting these theories by an enlargement to meet conditions far beyond their original intendment; sometimes, with startling audacity, abandoning them altogether to meet greater contingencies; but in all cases, with consummate skill and judgment, strengthening the national character, enhancing the welfare and accelerating the prosperity and progress of the nation.

The old idea of the nation for the benefit and protection of the several States, the old alliance idea, has been superseded by the higher and broader one of the States for the benefit and grandeur of one nation.

This metamorphosis toward single nationality has been unceasing in its development.

The American of one hundred and twenty-five years ago recognized a group of sovereign States united under a compact deemed essential for the protection of each, with pride of State and State sovereignty strong in the hearts of its citizens.

The American of a century later looked upon a great nation whose subdivisions were States, each with its own separate governing power, but with the pride of State coalesced and merged into the higher emotion of national patriotism.

The American of to-day, almost forgetting State boundaries, sees mainly a mighty empire with its lofty ranges of mountains, with its beautiful and fertile valleys, with its vast forests, its verdant plains, and its wonderful rivers. He sees no divisions but those traced by the hand of Omnipotence, and all of this comprising the most varied in topography, in produce, and in natural resources, a land of mountains and plains, of woodlands and lakes, of prairies and streams, and this he recognizes as his country.

Mr. President, I note this change of ideals, of theories, and policies, because it is particularly pertinent when we are asked to consider older guides a precedent for the admission of new States. There is an old precept of law that when the reason for a rule ceases the rule itself ceases. That precept is certainly applicable in this case.

Considered as a scheme of equitable representation, it was never claimed that giving the tiniest State, representing but a minute population, the same power, the same voice as a State of ten or a hundred times its size, or ten or a hundred times its population, had the sanction of reason and exact justice. Considered, however, as an expedient necessary to secure the union of the States, in the first instance, its justice was most manifest.

Now, Mr. President, in that case the end justified the means found necessary to secure it. But, from the standpoint of citizenship and nationality, the representation in the upper House of Congress is an illogical one.

The lines which divide States have little or no logical basis. They are, for the most part, run without reference to the particular characteristics of any section.

The original idea of representation in the upper House was mainly the representation of the States as separate units. This idea is no longer the dominant one. In fact, it may be said to be almost eliminated. Indeed, it can scarcely be said to-day that the representation here is by States at all. The State lines are practically obliterated, except for the purpose of the election of the members of this body.

Mr. President, in the development of our internal industries commercial assimilation has obliterated boundary lines and we are forced for all legislative purposes to recognize great sections, natural divisions, rather than States. As we view the country as an aggregate we group these sections together to make our map—the agricultural section, the coal, the iron, the cotton, the sugar, the lumber, the stock raising, the mining, and the diversified manufacturing sections. It is these sections, with their peculiar industries and interests, which are really represented in this body.

It is the people of these sections, speaking as such, whose voice is most potently felt upon every important measure before the Congress of the United States. Upon all local matters which are nonpartisan in character Vermont, Maine, and New Hampshire will vote as a unit. So, too, will Pennsylvania and West Virginia, the coal and iron States, while Indiana, Michigan, and Illinois will find themselves naturally harmonious. Minnesota and Wisconsin and Iowa will find like interests to protect and like objects to be secured, and the State lines between North and South Dakota, Nebraska, and all the wheat and corn raising States will scarcely be recognizable. The mining States will vote their several Representatives as one delegation, and the cotton States will combine the legislative efforts of all their members in the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, knowing, as we do, that it is the people and industries that are represented, rather than the territory encompassed within certain lines, it follows that the best results to the whole country can only be obtained when each of the great industries and the population supported thereby have a representation in this body commensurate with its importance when compared with each and all of the other industries.

Upon this foundation of equitable representation in this body of people and industries and sections, rather than upon the question of number and size of States, I base my support of the House measure in the main as being at least better adapted to produce such results in the future than the measure recommended by the majority of the Senate committee. If in the uniting of the several colonies into a single nation the size and population of any colony were necessarily abandoned in order to effect the compact, resulting in manifest inequality of representation both present and future, then the present inequality in the size or population of any proposed State, not necessarily permanent, can hardly be claimed to be of an objectionable character if it will tend to eliminate inequality.

If, on the whole, Mr. President, it tends to equalize with greater exactness the representation of all the sections and probable industries of the country, that alone warrants its favorable consideration by this body.

Whenever one section of the country or one industry has more than its proper proportion of voting power or influence, as I have said, considering its importance, there is always a danger that in the contest of each section to secure special benefits some other section or industry of equal or greater importance, but less strongly represented, will suffer in consequence.

The iron-producing sections of the country should not outweigh the diversified manufacturing sections. The great labor element of the cities should not outweigh in its representative power the labor element of the farms.

With equal justice this representation never can be, but approximately it can be secured by so legislating that the number of States into which the Union is divided, with their fixed representation in the Senate, will bear some relation to the section and the special interest or industry represented—by giving, so far as possible, each one of these sections a representation commensurate with its importance.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I have been following with interest the argument of the Senator from North Dakota, and in order to understand the basis of it clearly I want to ask the Senator if in his plea for the representation of sections rather than of States he means that there should be a representation of areas or a representation of population?

Mr. McCUMBER. The importance of industries will always be determined by population, because an industry is only important when we consider the number of people which is supported by that industry.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then I understand the Senator—and if so of course there is no disagreement between the Senator and myself and other Senators—to contend for representation by population, not for a representation of square miles merely, but a representation of people and not for a representation of mere productivity.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will state to the Senator that I will make that entirely clear before I get through with this discussion.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well.

Mr. McCUMBER. For instance, if we were to divide the territory comprising the United States to-day into 45 States, does any Senator believe that we would recognize the map which we would make in that division as the map which now exists? Does anyone consider for a single moment that the division would be other than by industries and by territory combined, so as to equalize as much as possible the voting power and strength of each industry according to its importance? I think our entire effort would be in that direction if we were to-day to attempt to make a new subdivision of the States constituting the United States.

To-day we can form some reasonable idea of the future development of the country. In that respect our judgment can be exercised with much greater accuracy than that of our predecessors of fifty or seventy-five years ago. To-day we know the character and natural resources of the whole country, and each and every portion of it, and can fairly estimate the population which can be supported in any Territory or in any particular section. We probably did not have the requisite information when we created the State of Nevada.

If the wheat, corn, and stock raising industries of the country represent one-half of the population of the United States, it is clear that the territory supporting that population should have one-half of the voting power in this Senate.

I think this proposition will partially explain to the Senator from Indiana my position—that it should have one-half of the voting power in this Senate and that every other industry should have the like voting power, according to its relative importance. The time may come when there will be a conflict between organized labor, we will say, in the manufacturing industries of the country and the agricultural labor of the country. Is it not apparent that such a conflict may arise at any time in the future? Let me give but one example. Let us take the matter of the manufacture of leather goods. Those people who are interested in the manufacture of shoes, boots, and other leather goods, while they had a market in the United States which took the entire product of their mills, were interested very naturally in keeping out all other goods of like character and in building up around them a tariff wall for their own protection.

When they go beyond this and become exporters, so that they need a foreign field and desire to produce cheaper, there may come a time when they will desire that the tariff be taken off of leather. This may, in case that we are able to curb the trusts, in some manner, so that the benefits will not accrue to them, be detrimental to the interests of the raiser of cattle; it may be detrimental to the farming and agricultural interests. In case a conflict of that kind should come before this body, anyone can easily see that it is to the interest of the country and the interest of both sections that the forces, the representative power, and the vote in this Senate be in accordance with the importance of the particular industry affected.

How would it be in other matters? Let us look into the present conditions a little; let us take the matter of stock raising. I have on my desk resolutions of several bodies in favor of taking off the tariff on meat, taking off the tariff on live stock, in order to curb the trusts. This tariff has been of incalculable benefit to the farmers of the Northwest and the agriculturists all over the country.

I simply mention this to show that there may be contests, and when there is a contest in the future between important matters of this kind every industry should be properly represented in this Senate; and I am not inquiring whether the representation comes particularly from the West or the East or from whatsoever section it may come, so that it protects the industry.

Let us carry this out a little further and see how it may affect our wheat-raising section of the country in the future. I wish to give the Senator a few figures that may interest him to know what our wheat raisers are looking forward to.

The great emigration of Americans into Canada, which has just commenced to flow in that direction, is due to the fact that tillable Government land in the United States is no longer to be obtained in sufficient quantities to meet the demand.

We have doubled in our population in the last thirty-five years and will double that population again in the next thirty-five years. In the year 1901 we raised about 700,000,000 bushels of wheat. We consumed all but about 132,000,000 bushels. At 5 bushels per capita, it would require but 26,000,000 more population to consume our entire product. Considering that wheat land will fail in its production in a few years, it can easily be seen that the time is not far distant when we will consume all the wheat we can raise. Then the Western farmer who has been the unfailing friend of protection will ask like protection when it will be of some particular benefit to him.

Mr. President, will the addition of three more States, as proposed in the House bill, tend to secure for all time a better and more logical representation in this body—and by that I mean representation of the diversified industries of the country?

The movement of the tide of immigration westward is of special interest as an indicator of the ability of both the southern and northern halves of the United States to sustain an equal proportion of population. In 1790 the center of population of the United States was about 23 miles east of Baltimore; in 1800 it was about 20 miles west of the same point. If we place a star at the center of population on the map in each decade since then, these stars will form almost a straight line along the thirty-ninth degree of north latitude.

In 1900 the census placed the center of population at 39 degrees 9 minutes and 36 seconds north latitude, 35 degrees 48 minutes and 54 seconds west longitude—about 6 miles southeast of Columbus, Ind.

If each half, the northern and southern, sustains an equal population in the future, as has been suggested, the representation in the Senate should be about equal. Bisecting, therefore, through a line in the center of population by east and west, and considering any State north or south of the line according as its greater bulk lies north or south of it, we have the following table:

STATES.

North.		South.
Number	26	Number	22
Number of representatives	52	Number of representatives	44
Population	45,787,475	Population	30,207,100
Combined area in square miles	1,298,504	Combined area in square miles	1,733,545
Average number of inhabitants per representative	880,528	Average number of inhabitants per representative	686,525
Average number of square miles per representative	24,971	Average number of square miles per representative	39,399

This is on the supposition, of course, Mr. President, that the three new States will be created, making 48 in all.

Let us consider this table for a moment. It shows the number of States which would be north and the number south, the number of representatives both north and south of the line, the population north and south of the line, the combined area in square miles both north and south, the average number of inhabitants per present representation, and the average number of square miles per present representation.

We would have, then, under present conditions 26 States north and 22 States south. The number of representatives, therefore, would be 52 north and 44 south; the population would be 45,787,475 north and 30,207,100 south. The combined area in square miles would be 1,298,504 north and 1,733,545 south; the average number of inhabitants per representative would be 880,528 north and 686,525 south, and the average number of square miles represented by each member would be 24,971 north and 39,379 south.

Mr. President, bisecting by a north and south line through a point representing the last center of population, let us view the representation by population at the present time; and here I insert a table showing practically the same thing in reference to this division.

STATES.

East.		West.
Number	20	Number	28
Number of representatives	40	Number of representatives	56
Population	39,815,510	Population	35,179,065
Combined area in square miles	574,215	Combined area in square miles	2,457,830
Average number inhabitants per representative	995,388	Average number inhabitants per representative	538,930
Average number of square miles per representative	14,605	Average number of square miles per representative	43,890

By this table we will then have 20 States east and 28 States west of the present center of population. The number of representatives east would be 40 and the number west 56. The population east would be 39,815,510 and the population west would be 35,179,065. The combined area in square miles for each representative would be 574,215 in the east and 2,457,830 in the west. The average number of inhabitants per representative in the east would be 995,388 and the average number of inhabitants per representative in the west would be 538,930. The average number of square miles per representative would be 14,605 in the east and 43,890 in the west.

Now, let us take another division, almost through the center of the United States. If we were to divide the country by States so that there were to be an equal amount of territory east and west of the line of division, such line would be drawn from the northeast corner of North Dakota to the southeast corner of Texas. This would give us the following:

STATES.

East.		West.
Number	31	Number	17
Number of representatives	62	Number of representatives	34
Population	64,806,613	Population	11,187,962
Combined area in square miles	1,292,605	Combined area in square miles	1,739,441
Average number of inhabitants per representative	1,045,268	Average number of inhabitants per representative	329,058
Average number of square miles per representative	20,348	Average number of square miles per representative	51,260

We would then have 31 States east and 17 in the western half. The number of representatives in the eastern half would be 62 and the number in the western half would be 34. The population in the east would be 64,806,613 and the population in the west would be 11,187,962. The combined area in square miles in the east would be 1,292,605 and in the west 1,739,441. The average number of inhabitants to a representative at the present time would be 1,045,268 in the east to 329,058 in the west. The average number of square miles represented by each member in this body would be 20,348 in the east and 51,260 in the west.

But perhaps the most important line of division in the United States, and the one that will appear to us most logical, will be the division made by the Mississippi River.

Under such a division nearly one-third of the territory of the United States would be east of this line and more than two-thirds would be west of this line. I submit to anyone who is acquainted with the entire United States that the probable population west of the Mississippi River in the next fifty years will be greater than the population in the eastern section.

Now, let us bisect by this line and see the number of States and the representation that each section would have if the bill as passed by the House should become a law. Bisecting by this natural division, we would have the number of States east of the Mississippi, 26; the number west, 22; the number of representatives east, 52; the number of representatives west, 44; present population east, 55,023,512; present population west, 20,971,063; the combined area in square miles in the east, 881,230; combined area of square miles in the west, 2,250,816. The average number of square miles which would be represented by each member would be, in the east, 16,947, and in the west, 51,155. The table is as follows:

STATES.

East.		West.
Number	26	Number	22
Number of representatives	52	Number of representatives	44
Population	55,023,512	Population	20,971,063
Combined area in square miles	881,230	Combined area in square miles	2,250,816
Average number of inhabitants per representative	1,058,144	Average number of inhabitants per representative	476,615
Average number of square miles per representative	16,947	Average number of square miles per representative	51,155

The chief value of these tables is that they may serve as a basis for calculating the future population of the several sections and the representation that the several sections of the country should have in this body.

The increase in population in the eastern section—that is, the section east of the present center of population, including the District of Columbia—in the last decade is about 17.7 per cent., while the increase in the western section, excluding Nevada, is about 49.4 per cent.

If the ratio of increase in the eastern and western divisions formed by the line running north and south through the center of population at the present time were to continue the same, these two populations would be almost equal in about four and one-half years; the 40,000,000 of the east, increasing at the rate of 17.7 per cent, would in that time be about 42,000,000, while the 35,000,000 of the west, increasing at the rate of 49 per cent, would be about 42,000,000, giving us a total population of some 84,000,000 within four and one-half years.

Taking all the States east of the North Dakota and Texas division, the increase in population in the last decade is about 19 per cent, while the increase in the States west of this division is about 72 per cent. If this ratio of increase were to continue the same for a period of fifty-five years, the populations of these two divisions would be about equal, as, increasing at the rate of 19 per cent, the 65,000,000 of the eastern section would be about 150,000,000, while the 11,000,000 of the western section would in the same time amount to about 151,000,000, giving us a total population of about 300,000,000.

But, taking another method of division, taking the two divisions north and south formed by the east and west line running through the center of population, we have an increase of 16 per cent in the north and 44 per cent in the south during the last decade. Increasing at this ratio for a period of about twenty years, we would have about 60,000,000 in the north, and about 62,000,000 in the south, making in all about an equal division of the total population, which would be about 122,000,000.

If anyone will look at the map of the United States to-day he will observe that the line of the center of population runs almost through the center of the United States, giving an equal area both north and south.

Let us take another division. Taking the two divisions formed by the Mississippi River—and this is, I think, the most important one to consider—we have had an increase during the last decade of about 18 per cent in the eastern section and of about 53 per cent in the western section. Increasing at this ratio for a period of about forty-six years, we would have about 137,000,000 in the east and about 138,000,000 in the west, making about an equal division of the total population of about 275,000,000.

So it will be observed from these tables that in less than half a century, even if the increase kept at its present rate, there would be an inequality in representation in favor of this less than one-third of the area, that east of the Mississippi River, in the proportion of 26 to 22.

But, as a matter of fact, we all know that, the West being the newer country and many portions of it being entirely unsettled at the present time, the proportionate increase will undoubtedly be greater in the West.

Take the State of Minnesota, so ably represented on this floor by the Senator who has been discussing this question [Mr. NELSON], and you find it has scarcely started in its wonderful possibilities of development. It is capable of supporting a population from ten to twenty or thirty times the present population of that State by its iron industries, by its wonderful forests in the northern half, which have scarcely been penetrated at the present time, and by its productive fields; there is probably not a foot of absolutely waste land in the entire State. That statement may almost be made with respect to Iowa, and especially of the agricultural sections, such as North Dakota and South Dakota.

So that, in any event, after a few years the representation must ever after be unequal, and the western two-thirds will be the section which will have the minor representation, even if this bill becomes a law. This inequality will be very much greater in case a less number of States is carved out of the Territories now not admitted into the Union.

While there are many miles of waste in the Western States and Territories, no one who is acquainted with the country as a whole will deny that the country west of the Mississippi River, constituting considerably more than two-thirds of the area of the United States, can support a population equal to the East, constituting less than one-third. If it can, no man can logically deny that it should have equal representation. It will not have this equal representation even if we create the three new States contemplated in this bill; but the disparity will be less if we do pass the House bill.

Now, Mr. President, let us consider the matter of population. I admit that States should always have a population sufficient in numbers to support a State which would be a credit to the Union, and which could, without overtaxation, carry on all the functions of a State.

There are strenuous objections made against the admission of these Territories as States, although it is admitted that some of them have populations much greater than some of the Eastern or New England States.

I do not believe that any Senator here would be entirely safe in making the proposition that the people of New Jersey or the people of Delaware are unable to support a State government, or that Rhode Island or New Hampshire or Vermont are unable to support a proper State government without overtaxation of the people; and if they can do it, I can see no reason, considering all the facts that have been presented by the Senator from Minnesota, why the probability is not equally in favor of the ability of any one of these Territories to support a good, stable Commonwealth, and that without any overtaxation of the territory within it.

But that a Territory has little population to-day does not always signify that it will remain in that condition. Like some of our large States whose population has decreased during certain periods, then by some new impulse adding very rapidly to its population, these Territories may, in the next decade, show an enormous development. They certainly have that in them which is capable of development, according to the report which has been made by the Senate committee.

Nebraska gained but three-tenths of 1 per cent in the ten years from 1890 to 1900. The excess of births over deaths must have been far greater than that. Its people poured over into Oklahoma and other sections. But it is again growing rapidly.

I think that too little consideration has been given to the benefits that may be obtained by irrigation in these Territories in order to support a population. I will admit that the amount of land that is irrigated at the present time is exceedingly minute; but, nevertheless, there are possibilities of irrigation there which I believe will make these Territories comparatively great and prosperous States.

Now, I wish to call attention to some matters which I have prepared in reference to the irrigation of these Territories. Let us take Arizona. It has an area of 113,020 square miles, or 72,332,800 acres. Of this amount 185,396 acres have been irrigated, as shown by the census reports of 1900, or, we will say, only one-fourth of 1 per cent of the entire area. The amount of land that can be irrigated has been estimated at from seven to twelve million acres, and this is estimated by one who certainly is regarded as an authority, but who has been condemned in that Territory for making an underestimation.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Who is the authority?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. F. H. Newell. Hon. Binger Hermann, in a speech at Phoenix, Ariz., a few years ago, gave the estimate at 12,000,000 acres, while Mr. F. H. Newell, chief of the division of hydrography, Geological Survey, estimates that about 10 to 12 per cent of the entire area could be irrigated. Taking the latter estimate, 10 per cent, and we would have 7,000,000 acres more of land in the Territory that can be made habitable by irrigation. Now, let us give 40 acres, as the law contemplates, to each family—what the Government allowance undoubtedly would be for each head of a family of the irrigated land. That would support a hundred and seventy-five thousand families. Estimating five persons to a family, we would have 875,000 people who could be supported upon this irrigated land alone.

Plans have been prepared by the Geological Survey for the construction of the Santa Carlos dam on the Gila River, which would furnish water to irrigate over a hundred thousand acres. The crops raised on the irrigated lands are as yet largely confined to citrus fruits, oranges, lemons, limes, grapes, etc., and alfalfa; but wheat, corn, oats, potatoes, and other vegetables, tobacco, cotton, broom corn, and peanuts are raised on irrigated farms to a considerable extent.

Now, let us take New Mexico. It has an area of 78,374,400 acres, of which 326,800 acres are recognized as improved farming lands; and of the 326,800 acres, 204,508 acres are irrigated, a little more than one-fourth of 1 per cent, I will admit.

The amount of irrigable land in the Territory is about the same as that of Arizona, 10 per cent, we will say, of the total acreage, and, taken on the same basis as Arizona, would support about the same number of inhabitants. The products of this Territory are the same as those of Arizona—corn, wheat, oats, and fruits.

No estimate has been made for the establishment of an irrigation system other than an estimate of the cost of survey of a dam at the Rio Grande River.

Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has spoken quite elaborately upon the great amount of waste land which might be used for pasturage, but for the reason that stock raising can not be carried on at a distance greater than 4 or 5 miles from the source of water supply. If we are able to take water a distance of 30 and 40 and 60 and 100 miles for the purposes of irrigation, requiring a hundred or thousand times greater quantity than it would require for the purpose of supplying little watering places for the use of stock here and there scattered over that Territory, then certainly we can conceive of a method by which we can graze stock even in that Territory at a distance of more than 5 miles from running streams.

But in addition to that, if I am correctly informed, there are in the uplands pools of water formed by the melting of snows on the mountains and flowing down short distances, and forming here and there in the low places over the uplands pools, not running streams, which have been utilized for stock-raising purposes. There is a wonderful field there for the stock-raising industry which has not been developed in either of these Territories.

We have in addition to that certain statements, which I will read, from the report on the statehood bill. This is the statement of a person who, I will admit, is interested in the admission of New Mexico into the Union as a State, but, nevertheless, as he is an inhabitant of that Territory—I refer to Mr. RODEY—he certainly ought to be able to give us quite accurate information. I wish to call attention to some facts which show that this Territory is capable of carrying on a government of itself and capable of supporting one. I quote now from page 330, where he said:

The governor figures our population at the time the census was taken as about 300,000 people.

Those who were present and heard the testimony will of course recall how he arrived at that number, stating, as I believe, that it was impossible to get men to go out into the country to take the census for the amount of compensation allowed them. He continues:

We have established in New Mexico since then 75 or 80 post-offices. We now have some 363 post-offices in the Territory. We have built eight or nine hundred miles of railroad in the last two years or a little over, and with the consequent influx of population we surely now have the population we claim. There has been a further influx of population on account of mining and for other reasons, until I am satisfied to-day that while the census only gives us 195,310 people, we have actually nearer 400,000; and we surely have between three hundred and thirty and three hundred and fifty thousand people in New Mexico, without any question whatever.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. MCCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did not catch the name of the witness from whom the Senator reads.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I read from the testimony of Mr. RODEY, the Delegate from that Territory.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What estimate of the present population of New Mexico does he make?

Mr. MCCUMBER. He claims that it is between three hundred and thirty and three hundred and fifty thousand at the present time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator accept that?

Mr. MCCUMBER. I think I am as well justified in accepting his statement—that of a gentleman who has lived there for the last fifteen or twenty years—as I am in accepting statements from other sources, especially as he knows the immigration that has poured into that Territory since the last census, and he undoubtedly knows the condition of the Territory in other respects. But I would say to the Senator that I am perfectly willing to take as the basis of this argument the population as given by the census of 1900. I have already quoted the number.

Delegate RODEY continues:

The school census for the last year, which has just come in, shows that there are about 70,000 children of school age. Those statistics prove conclusively that the census as to New Mexico is wrong.

I have here a small statement, which I will submit to the stenographer, showing the taxable property.

Omitting that and going on with his further statement, he said:

We have in New Mexico 122,510 square miles of area, or nearly 80,000,000 acres. Between fifty-five and sixty million acres of that is still public domain. About twenty-five millions of it is private property, that will be subject to taxation when we become a State. It is calculated conservatively—I have been over it time and again and know whereof I speak—that we have between two hundred and fifty and three hundred million dollars' worth of property that will be subject to taxation when we become a State. A tax of 1 per cent levied upon that would bring in from two and a half to three million of dollars per annum, so that we could in our constitution, for the first twenty years of our State life, limit our taxation to 1 per cent. We only require now about $1,200,000 per annum to pay all our fixed charges and all the running expenses of the Territorial government.

New constitutions always economize. Therefore it can be truly said that were we inclined to extreme economy we might even limit our taxation to one-half of 1 per cent for the first ten or twenty years of our State life and then have the lowest-taxed community in the United States of America.

Here is an important feature:

Mr. RODEY. We have Territorial, municipal, county, school, and road taxes now, the same as anywhere else. We pay the largest school taxes, I believe, of any Territory or State in the Union. Our tax collected for school purposes last year amounted to a little more than a million of dollars, one-half of which was paid in teachers' wages.

A little more than a million dollars paid for school purposes alone in that Territory, and yet it is said that it has not sufficient taxable property so that it may become one of the States of the Union.

We have a fine capitol building; we have a penitentiary building; we have an insane asylum; we have an agricultural college; we have a university; we have two normal universities, and we have from ten to fifteen cities, modern, up-to-date places, with from one to five fine brick schoolhouses in each of them, costing, as in my own town, for instance, $30,000 and $40,000 apiece.

Now, in reference to the population again, taking another estimate, he says:

At the election at which I was elected the lists showed a registration of within a few hundred of 60,000 voters—a great many in that large area; for recollect the area of New Mexico only lacks a few hundred square miles of being as great as the combined area of New York, New Jersey, and all of the New England States.

Ordinarily we estimate population at about five for each voter. It may be that in the Western country, where the male population undoubtedly is greatly in excess, we can not estimate it at so high a number. It is safe to say, however, that there are 250,000 people there. Further on he says:

The condition of everything in New Mexico is improving vastly—so fast, in fact, that its people confess that in all its history it never made such rapid progress as it has during the last two or three years.

We want to come into the Union. We have been asking for admission for so many years that we think no argument ought to be made against it. Our population now is three times that of Wyoming, eight times that of Nevada, twice that of Idaho, and is almost equal to that of Vermont. It is nearly twice that of Delaware. The population argument cuts no figure.

And if Delaware and some other States, as I have stated, can carry on a government with their population, I do not know why a Territory with two or three or four times the population could not with equal propriety conduct a State government.

Let us consider for a moment, Mr. President, the coal fields in the northern part of this Territory. I am informed that the northern half of this Territory contains hundreds of thousands of acres of fine coal lands to be developed.

Mr. QUARLES. What Territory?

Mr. MCCUMBER. New Mexico. I do not know to what extent it has been developed; but I understand from the best of sources that coal is found all over the northern half of the Territory; and considering that that is one of the great industries of the United States, I can imagine that when it is developed for the use of the growing population of the western section of the country it will support of itself an immense population, and that the entire northern part of the Territory may become in the future, say in the course of twenty-five or thirty or forty years, a great hive of industry.

Let us look upon this map, viewed so often by the Senator from Minnesota. We can scarely, with the naked eye, find Delaware upon the map. We can place perhaps something less than a hundred Delawares within the boundaries of the present Territory of New Mexico. We could make very many such States out of the Territory of New Mexico at the present time, and perhaps within thirty or forty years we could make twenty or thirty of them in population from the same Territory.

But, Mr. President, what are we going to do with this Territory? We have here, as will be seen by observing the map, two Territories great in area—New Mexico and Arizona. Because of their enormous extent no one would think of uniting them into one single State. We can not add them to the State of Nevada. We have no power to do that. We can not attach them to any of the States West or East. We could scarcely attach them to this little handle of Oklahoma.

Then, if we can not, what are we going to do with them in the future if the proposition of the Senate committee is absolutely correct? I think the conclusion would be that they would never have a population sufficient to keep up with the increasing population of the balance of the States and which would justify their being taken into the Union at any future time, because in ten or fifteen or twenty or thirty or fifty years we would require a Territory to have ten or fifteen or twenty times their present population in order to be admitted into the Union of States.

Now, what will we do with this vast Territory? What will we do with it in the interim? We can not very well make it into one State; it covers too much area for that. It seems to me we can justly and appropriately make it into two States to-day, and that there is a population there sufficient at the present time to estimate conclusively a greater population in the future and enough to make it a good respectable State.

Mr. President, the committee tell us that a certain percentage of the people of New Mexico are illiterate. They say that the Territory has a population of 195,000, and that 32.2 per cent neither read nor write any language. That would make 64,842 persons who can neither read nor write. That is bad, to be sure. There is no one who would not wish we could have a better condition than that in any of our States. But all of these people are and for fifty years have been a part of this nation. That is an important feature.

To be sure, they might, in a sense, while in a Territorial condition, be regarded as wards, but for all intents and purposes we regard them as a part of our body politic. They make up a portion of the great mass of humanity which we claim as the population of the United States. When we speak of the population of the United States in the last census, we invariably include the Territories south of British America, as we include the District of Columbia.

So they are already here—a part of us. What injury will therefore follow to the Government if we change their organic act into a constitution; if, instead of giving them a governor, they make their own selection; if, instead of sending them judges, they elect their own attorneys as judges? Is there any danger to ourselves as a nation in making this change? If not, will the interests of our people, these people, these illiterates, be best subserved by continuing their Territorial form of government?

The Senator from Minnesota suggested that we should keep them in this training school of Territorialism for a number of years longer, until the people cease to be illiterate and until they understand the English language and speak it more thoroughly. I want to ask the Senator in all candor if he does not think that fifty years of this training school is about long enough and, if we find that fifty years of Territorial training is insufficient to bring about the desired results, whether it is not about time that we adopt some other system of training? Bring them into the Union, and self-interest may bring about a more favorable result.

But besides this, if they are to be admitted as a State, they can themselves determine the extent of franchise. It is not necessary that they give the illiterate the right of franchise. They may exclude them if they think it best for the interest of the State so to do and they have enough of those who are not illiterate, so that they can attend to the balance of the population.

If it were simply a question of taking in a new population from foreign lands, it would be a different proposition, but this is a question of a form of government for our own people. I lived in a Territory for some years. I know some of the hardships of Territorial life. I know that the conditions are changed and our Territories are treated better to-day by the Congress of the United States than they were a few years ago. I remember when all our courts were imported, and I remember practicing law before such judges. I call to my mind to-day an incident which shows the character of some of the judges under whom we were compelled to try our cases.

I recall being the prosecutor in a certain character of case against a railroad corporation in the Territory, and the judge came there from a neighboring city to hold the court. He desired very much to get back to his home town, and I desired very much before the court adjourned to go on with the trial of my case. At last he came to me and said: "I have been talking with Mr. ———, who represents the attorney for the defendant, and he tells me that you have not any case, and I do not see why it is necessary, therefore, for me to continue the court any longer, as I am desirous of going back and holding court at another place." This gives us a little idea of some of the courts which were forced upon the Territory of Dakota when it was in a Territorial condition.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I admit that such conditions probably do not exist to-day.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think the Senator's last sentence, perhaps, has answered the question which possibly the Senator anticipated when he saw me rise, which was, whether or not he attributes to either of these Territories to-day the condition he has graphically narrated with relation to his own State when it was a Territory?

Mr. McCUMBER. Before I made the statement I stated, and if the Senator had been listening he would have heard it——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did listen.

Mr. McCUMBER. I stated that I did not think the Territories were treated exactly the same to-day by the Congress of the United States as they were a few years ago. If he had understood that, he probably would not have asked the question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; but perhaps I would have made the comment which I now make, that if that is true the pertinency of the graphic illustration of the Senator loses its force; because if it relates to a condition which existed formerly in Territories and which he admits does not prevail to-day, where is the argument to be drawn from his statement? He admits that the very thing of which he complains has passed away.

Mr. McCUMBER. I shall not for one moment admit that it does not apply to a very great extent.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That being true, there was then some force in the question I asked the Senator, because I was going to ask the Senator whether he had observed in the testimony the high tribute paid by all the witnesses to the quality of the Federal judiciary in these Territories, both as to character and ability.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, Mr. President, I will not for a moment be diverted to the consideration of the present judiciary in those Territories.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understood the Senator to be discussing——

Mr. McCUMBER. That is not germane to the proposition I was making, and I certainly can not understand that it has the slightest reference to it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not myself think it has; but since the Senator was making an argument——

Mr. McCUMBER. I was speaking more particularly of the form of government and the right the people in the Territories have to select their own judiciary and to select men with whom they are acquainted.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And the Senator——

Mr. McCUMBER. And I say—and the Senator will bear me out well—that politics and friendship very often play a most effective rôle in making the selections and in making representations for the selection of the judiciary and of other officers in the Territories. I believe, and I think the Senator will bear me out, that taking the decisions of our courts in the several Territories in earlier days and comparing them with the decisions of the courts when made up of representatives of Territories, the first decisions will scarcely compare favorably with the latter.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Since the Senator appeals to me to bear him out, I will say that it is my opinion, inasmuch as the Senator so kindly asks it, that politics and the favor of politicians do not play so great a part in the appointment of Federal judges in the Territories and in the litigation which they have before them as they do where judges are elected; and it is for this very reason that a large and growing sentiment of the most thoughtful in this country has constantly agitated in favor of the appointment of judges, and that for long terms or for life. I want to say before I close——

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to answer the Senator right here and say that my own experience and observation do not lead me to conform to his views.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; because, as the Senator well says, he lived in a Territory under the old Territorial practice. It is not the system, because the system is the same, but a practice, which he admits has passed away. I did not mean to interrupt the Senator. I do not care to divert the course of the Senator's remarks.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am very glad to be interrupted.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But I merely wished to say that if there is any objection to the system, it must be because of the evils which that system entails upon the people; and he himself recognized that by citing an instance of the evils that had been entailed upon the people of his own State when it was a Territory. So it was pertinent for me to call attention to the high quality of the Federal judiciary of these Territories as respects character and ability and learning.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I were called upon to pay tribute to the judiciary of those Territories, I probably would try to equal the eloquent words of the Senator from Indiana in reference to them; but that is not the subject of discussion here. I might cite to the Senator, if he wished to look into that matter a little further, another condition relative to the judiciary as it existed but a few years ago in these Territories, and I am not certain whether or not it has been changed since. We had Territorial supreme courts. The Territorial supreme court in my own Territory, I remember, was composed of the several judges who were members of the inferior courts, and so an appeal was always taken from a decision of a judge for his own decision again, sitting in another place. It was only under extraordinary circumstances that they ever reversed themselves.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That system has been changed. The judge who decided the case at nisi prius no longer sits with the court who reviews his opinion; his associates sit. That is true also of the United States court of appeals.

Mr. McCUMBER. But this is only one out of hundreds of instances which can be given.

Mr. President, it is said these people of New Mexico speak the old Spanish language. I admit that the great majority of them do, but it is because they are isolated and segregated. Why, there are whole counties in several of the Western States, in the agricultural States, where almost nothing but German or Scandinavian is spoken. Not only that, we take into this country every year a class of people who do not speak English several times the population of the non-English-speaking inhabitants of New Mexico, and we do assimilate them. If we can do that, can we not assimilate the 65,000 of illiterate people in the Territory of New Mexico? What do we lose by taking this Territory into the Union as a State?

What have we lost by the admission of Wyoming, with not near the same population, or Idaho, or Nevada even? It certainly will not be assumed that the personnel of the Senate has been lowered, either in intelligence or character or patriotism. The representation of Wyoming, Idaho, and Nevada, with their small populations, negative even an intimation of this character. The present representation from these Territories show not alone the good judgment of the people of these States, but also of Congress in admitting them as States. Then, too, these States determine, as I have stated, the franchise right of their own citizens, and they can determine what voice an illiterate shall have in the form of the government or in the laws.

From another point of view: What weight should be given the question of illiteracy? Estimating at 33.3 per cent, the actual number of illiterates in the Territory of New Mexico, as I have stated, would be 64,842. We therefore must assimilate 64,842 persons whose whole lives have been spent in this country and who must have unconsciously absorbed some American ideas of government and civilization. Now, if their illiteracy is by the committee regarded as objectionable, as dangerous to the mental and moral health of the people, that this will be poison to the body politic, what can we say of our ability to absorb, without serious detriment, ten times as many in the last eight years?

In the year 1902 we allowed to become a part of our body politic 165,350 people, all illiterates by their own admission, and probably in truth about twice as many, as we have no means of determining the verity of their statements. In the last eight years we have admitted—and whether they have been fully assimilated I am unable to say—660,654 illiterates. Italy furnished us last year 79,400 illiterates, or 42 per cent of her entire immigration.

South Italy, from whom most of these immigrants came, gave us 49 per cent of illiterates. In the last eight years Italy has given us 307,700 illiterates, and, as I have suggested, in all probability twice that number. Austria in the same time has given us 165,350 illiterates, or 26 per cent of her entire immigration. I submit herewith a table showing the total immigration to the United States and the total immigration from Italy and Austria from 1895 to 1902, showing per cent of illiteracy:

Total immigration to the United States.

Year.	Immigrants.	Illiterates.	Per cent.
1895	258,536	44,914	20
1896	343,267	83,196	25

1902	178,375	79,400	42
Total	713,456	307,700	44

Austria shows up in almost the same ratio.

AUSTRIA.

Year.	Immigrants.	Illiterates.	Per cent.
1895	33,401	10,150	33
1896	65,103	25,700	45
1897	33,031	7,800	25
1898	39,797	8,450	21
1899	62,491	12,500	20
1900	114,847	27,755	24
1901	113,390	28,500	25
1902	171,989	44,500	26
Total	634,049	165,350	26

It seems to me idle to make as a basis the question of illiteracy of 60,000 or 65,000 people in the interior of the country, not in the great cities but upon our farms and in the agricultural and sheep-raising sections of the country, while at the same time we do not the slightest thing to prevent ten or fifteen or twenty times the number of illiterates from coming in every decade.

Now, these people who can neither read nor write nor speak English, who come from a country where they are denied practically all franchise, who have never inherited the principles of self-governing character, all come to this country, and in six months they may declare their intention of becoming citizens, and in some of the States, as I am informed, may exercise the elective franchise after having declared their intention, exercising all the rights and privileges of the most intelligent and Americanized of our people.

If illiteracy should be the basis upon which we were to lay all objections to foreign immigration, we would let all of the Chinese in and keep one-third of southern Europe out.

As a matter of fact, the desirability or undesirability of a people or of immigration depends upon race and not upon mere ability to read or write.

For my own part, Mr. President, I do not think that I underrate the intelligence of this class of people from southern Europe—Italy, Sicily, and Roumania—by believing that the people of New Mexico, described in the report of the committee as being of Mexican and Spanish blood, measure up to them in all respects of desirability as American citizens.

Mr. President, I have taken up a little more time already than I expected to take in this discussion. It seems to me that even after the exhaustive argument of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] he has shown in no respect how these people will be injured by taking them into the Union. He has not shown that they are incapable of supporting a State government. He has not, in my opinion, demonstrated the fact that they will not have either population or industries sufficient to justify constituting them into the several States as provided by the House bill.

Above all, I fail to see that he has shown that the nation itself will be injured in any way by granting them the rights of citizens of the great United States. On the contrary, Mr. President, it seems to me almost conclusive, even by the report that is made of the hearings of this committee, that these people are capable of establishing and maintaining a good, stable government. From the standpoint on which I have made this argument, that of securing a proper representation of every industry coextensive with its importance, I certainly can see no objection to adding to the number of Representatives west of the Mississippi River.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. QUARLES. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for a moment to make an announcement?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from Wisconsin wants me to yield in order that he may make an announcement. I took the floor only that I might make an announcement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from North Dakota who has just concluded his speech has occupied so much more time than I supposed he would when I yielded to him that I have concluded, at the request of some other Senators, and in deference to other business, to postpone taking up this bill for discussion until to-morrow. I ask, if it be necessary, that I may have the floor to-morrow at the conclusion of the morning business, in order that I may make some remarks in support of the statehood bill, and I give notice that if I get the floor I will not yield to anybody else.

Mr. SPOONER. Not even for a question?

Mr. FORAKER. I might yield for a question, but I am sure I would not yield the floor unless for something that was very urgent.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is not here. I guess that the Senator's request does not interfere with the statement of the Senator from South Carolina that he had the floor and expected to go on to-morrow morning. I should be very glad to have the Senator do so, only I thought in fairness to the Senator from South Carolina that should be understood.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know what the understanding is as to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. He gave notice.

Mr. FORAKER. Has he some right to the floor in the morning?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; he gave notice. He did not finish his speech this morning.

Mr. FORAKER. I gave notice two or three days ago that I would speak this morning at the conclusion of the morning business, but when the conclusion of the morning business came somebody else seemed to have the floor, and I waited until 2 o'clock.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think the Senator from South Carolina gave notice that he was the unfinished business for to-morrow morning. He used about those words.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. There is no confusion about it. The Senator from South Carolina gave notice that he would speak to the measure before the Senate in the morning hour, and the Senator from Ohio gives notice that he will speak at the conclusion of the morning hour, as I understand it.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly; if the Senator from South Carolina speaks during the morning hour he has a perfect right to it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then the Senator from Ohio will speak to-morrow at 2 o'clock or earlier?

Mr. FORAKER. I want to speak to-morrow morning as soon as I can.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am anxious that you should.

Mr. QUARLES. I should like to inquire from the Senator from Ohio whether it would be inconsistent with his suggestion or plan that we should take up the militia bill to-morrow morning immediately after the routine business?

Mr. FORAKER. I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin to take up the militia bill now.

Mr. QUARLES. The only objection to that is that there is such a thin Senate here I fear it might subject us to criticisms. However, we could call in Senators by suggesting the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BACON. I was going to say, with the permission of the Senator from Wisconsin, that there has been such a coming together of parties who have differed upon the militia bill that I do not think there is any danger of the criticism which he suggests, and if he will follow out the suggestion which he has just made and call for a quorum, I am quite sure there will be enough present to warrant the action of the Senate upon the bill at this time. I do not think that there will be any discussion. I can not speak for anybody except for myself further than to say that the changes which have been made in the bill and which will be proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, representing the committee, are such as I know meet the concurrence of those with whom I have heretofore been acting in opposition to a certain part of the bill. I believe everyone who has been acting in opposition to that particular part of it will be satisfied with what the Senator from Wisconsin is himself going to propose.

I recall the fact that when this bill was first brought before the Senate, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] who was then in charge of the bill, and who is now unfortunately detained by sickness from the Chamber, mentioned a fact which makes it important that no day should be lost, if the bill can be passed, and that is that the action of the State legislatures is important and those legislatures are now in session.

There being, in the shape which is going to be given to the bill, no objection to it, but on the contrary, as I think, it will have the very hearty support of all of us, I see no reason why we should not proceed with it this afternoon, especially as there seems to be an interval now which may not be found to-morrow.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Cockrell,	Hoar,	Quarles,
Alger,	Cullom,	Jones, Ark.	Quay,
Allison,	Depew,	Kean,	Scott,
Bacon,	Dillingham,	Kittredge,	Simmons,
Bate,	Dolliver,	Lodge,	Simon,
Berry,	Dubois,	McComas,	Spooner,
Beveridge,	Elkins,	McCumber,	Stewart,
Blackburn,	Fairbanks,	Martin,	Taliaferro,
Burnham,	Foraker,	Mitchell,	Vest,
Carmack,	Foster, La.	Perkins,	Wetmore.
Clapp,	Foster, Wash.	Pettus,
Clark, Wyo.	Frye,	Platt, Conn.
Clay,	Hanna,	Platt, N. Y.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. PROCTOR] is detained by illness from the Senate.

Mr. QUAY. I wish to mention in behalf of my colleague [Mr. PENROSE] that he is necessarily absent from the city.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 16649) to provide rebate of duties on coal; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

REBATE OF DUTIES ON COAL.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the bill just received from the House may be laid before the Senate.

The bill (H. R. 16649) to provide rebate of duties on coal was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALDRICH. I wish to give notice that the committee will probably report this bill back within a very few minutes. I give this notice with a view that Senators who are interested in the matter may be present in the Chamber when it is considered. I shall ask the Senate then to consider it.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. QUARLES. I ask that the bill known as the militia bill may now be taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill known as the militia bill. Is there objection?

Mr. QUAY. I have no objection to that course, as there seems to be no one prepared to take the floor this afternoon upon the pending order of business, unless it is possible to have a vote. I desire to say to the Senator who is leading the Committee on Territories in opposition to the bill that the friends of the pending bill are ready to vote now. I would be glad to know what he has to say to the proposition.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did not hear the Senator. I was engaged in conversation.

Mr. QUAY. I propose to take a vote on the statehood bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. When?

Mr. QUAY. Now.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not know how the Senator is going to do that in view of the notice given by his chief orator that he was going to proceed upon the bill to-morrow.

Mr. QUAY. I have no doubt the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] will withdraw his notice if it would be any accommodation to the delicacy of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I could not for a moment be so discourteous to the Senator from Ohio as to agree to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. QUAY. I object unless there is a distinct understanding that it does not interfere with the pending order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is distinctly understood, and it was so stated by the Chair.

Mr. QUAY. And the understanding is that a vote is refused?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not know what the understanding of the Senator is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none, and the militia bill is before the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. Before the Senator from Wisconsin proceeds I hope he will allow me to make a privileged report from the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island.

REBATE OF DUTIES ON COAL.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 16649) to provide rebate of duties on coal, to report it back favorably with an amendment. I ask that the bill and the amendment of the committee may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to make full rebate of duties imposed by law on all coal of every form and description imported into the United States from foreign countries for the period of one year from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. ALDRICH. The committee report an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as an additional section the following:

SEC. 2. That the provisions of paragraph 415 of the tariff act of July 24, 1897, shall not hereafter be construed to authorize the imposition of any duty upon anthracite coal.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the report of the committee upon this subject is unanimous, both upon the original bill and upon the amendment, and I ask that the bill be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I simply rise for myself, and I think I represent the unanimous opinion of Democratic Senators here, to express a desire that the bill and amendment may be considered at once, and may be passed without a single vote against it.

Mr. LODGE. I merely desire to say, Mr. President, that it has been my intention to offer an amendment to this bill for the admission of coal free of duty from such countries as admit or shall hereafter admit our coal free; but I am not willing in any way to delay the passage of this bill. I do not wish to offer anything that will give rise to debate, and I am aware that if I offer such an amendment as the one I refer to—in which I strongly believe—it would open the door to other amendments as well as to much debate. This I am unwilling to do after the statement made by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], and because this is an emergency bill of urgent importance, especially so since the amendment which the Committee on Finance has adopted, I therefore shall not offer my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment. The Committee on Finance have reported an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, as section 2, the following:

SEC. 2. That the provisions of paragraph 415 of the tariff act of July 24, 1897, shall not hereafter be construed to authorize the imposition of any duty upon anthracite coal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the chairman of the Finance Committee what will be the effect of this amendment in regard to coal imported and in bond?

Mr. ALDRICH. Under the provisions of the act which was passed recently in regard to the tea duty all coal in bond would undoubtedly be admitted under the terms of this bill and not under the law as it before existed with regard to coal.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, if that be the fact in respect to coal in bond, what would it be in respect of the coal duty paid at the several ports on like coal on which no duty was charged at other ports? Has any provision been made for a rebate of such duty?

Mr. ALDRICH. Not by this bill. That is a matter which will be covered later.

Mr. MCCOMAS. But later it will be considered?

Mr. ALDRICH. Unquestionably; and the persons who paid duties would have an equitable claim anyway against the Government.

Mr. MCCOMAS. That satisfies me.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALDRICH, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide rebate of duties on coal, and for other purposes."

EFFICIENCY OF THE MILITIA.

Mr. QUARLES. I now renew my request for unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill to promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15345) to promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes.

Mr. QUARLES. On behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, on page 1, line 8, before the word "classes," it is proposed to strike out the word "three" and insert "two."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that there is a pending amendment, which was offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS].

Mr. QUARLES. I will say that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be included in the committee amendments to be presented very soon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the amendment is pending, and the Chair is compelled to recognize the fact that it is pending. The Senator from Alabama can withdraw the amendment temporarily, if he pleases.

Mr. PETTUS. If it is a matter of precedence I will withdraw my amendment temporarily.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama temporarily withdraws his amendment. The amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES] will be again stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 1, line 8, before the word "classes," it is proposed to strike out "three" and insert "two."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BATE. I should like to ask the Senator if that is one of the amendments that was agreed to this morning in committee? I was not present at the time, though invited to attend.

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly it is. I now offer a second amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, on page 2, line 1, it is proposed to strike out the words "the National Volunteer Reserve as provided by this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. QUARLES. I now offer a third amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 22, on page 12, line 22, after the word "militia," it is proposed to strike out "or of the National Volunteer Reserve."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. QUARLES. I now offer a fourth amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 23, on page 14, line 12, it is proposed to strike out the word "the," where it occurs immediately after the word "constitute," and insert the word "an."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. QUARLES. Now, Mr. President, I offer a fifth amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 23, on page 14, in line 18, after the words "United States," it is proposed to insert "other than the Military Academy at West Point."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. QUARLES. I now offer a sixth amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of the section numbered 24.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further amendments?

Mr. QUARLES. There are two pending amendments, Mr. President, one introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] and the other by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN].

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment heretofore introduced by myself, with a change in the form in which it is printed by striking out the word "church" wherever it appears and inserting "religious organization." I do that in view of the suggestion of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that it would more accurately meet the situation. I offer it as it is there now, with those words stricken out and the other words written in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as modified by the Senator from Indiana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a proviso to the second section of the bill the following:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to require or compel any member of any religious organization whose creed forbids its members to participate in war in any form, and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein, in accordance with the creed of said religious organization, to serve in the militia or any other armed or volunteer force under the jurisdiction and authority of the United States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, this amendment I offer to cover two or three well-known religious organizations in the United States—particularly the Quakers and the Dunkards. It is well known that it is one of the fundamental tenets of their creed that war in any form is murder, and that they are conscientiously opposed to participating therein. The point will be made—and perhaps with some weight, too—that in this bill as it now stands amended, with section 24 stricken out, my amendment is not necessary; nevertheless, Mr. President, it certainly can do, and it will be admitted that it can do, no harm.

While I myself am not in favor of loading a bill with unnecessary provisions, yet I think it is perfectly right that when a great and weighty and intelligent body of our fellow-citizens—and there are no more intelligent or worthy citizens of this United States than those known as the Quakers—ask for a thing of this kind in a bill like this, it should be granted. Certainly, if it be their opinion that when they go to war they are participating in a species of murder, they should not be forced to do so. Therefore upon that hypothesis the amendment should be adopted. If, on the contrary, it does not compel them to do so, then the amendment can do no harm. In either event, it would be without injury, meeting the wishes of one of the very large and one of the very best elements of the citizenship of this Republic.

I hope the amendment will be accepted; and if it is not accepted, of course I shall want a vote upon it.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, if I understand the purport of this whole bill, it does not force anybody into the military service.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No.

Mr. BATE. This bill, as I understand it, does not compel anyone, whatever may be his age or his religious faith, to go into the military service. If I thought it did, I would be against this bill. I do not think so, but nevertheless I do not care to make objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana. I think that we have precedents on that sort of legislation. I believe it is not an innovation upon existing legislation in regard to the militia. Certainly some of the States have so legislated. I think those sects having religious scruples against military service are generally excepted, and ought to be when no consititutional objection intervenes. I do not make any point about that, however, because I do not understand from this bill that there is anything which constrains or forces anyone, even a militiaman, to go into the Army.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; the Senator is right about that.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I certainly hope that the amendment will not be adopted, because it is absolutely unnecessary and is not germane, and would constitute defective legislation. There is nothing compulsory connected with the militia system; but the organization of the militia is left entirely to the States. Each State can regulate for itself the membership of the militia. We do not assume to do that here at all. In none of the States is there any provision that is at all coercive. The membership of the militia in every State is purely voluntary. I can not see why we ought to attach to the bill this clause, wholly unnecessary and impertinent as it is, no matter how worthy the people may be to whom the amendment refers.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I desire to say in this connection that I should not favor this bill if the twenty-fourth section had remained in it. Other amendments, I believe, have been made in conformity with the striking out of the twenty-fourth section, removing the objectionable features and relieving the question of doubtful constitutionality. Congress can go no further in organizing and governing the militia in a State or dealing with it in any way except as authority is expressly given in the Constitution in Article I and section 8, and it requires that the officers of the militia be appointed by the States, which is, in my opinion, the redeeming feature of this bill.

There are many things now in the bill which I do not approve, but I see the necessity for something of the kind in our country, and as the National Guards have generally done well I waive my objections and shall vote for this bill as amended.

As to the pending amendment, I think it is germane, and that the Senator from Wisconsin is mistaken as to that. Like him, I do not see the necessity for the amendment, but I do not desire to throw obstacles in the way of its adoption, as it can do no mischief and will be a relief to such harmless and law-abiding citizens as Quakers and Dunkards.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There is a further consideration with reference to this amendment, a consideration entertained in the minds of this very large and very respectable body of our fellow-citizens. They intend to present their opinions to the various State legislatures when the question of militia legislation comes up, and there is a very distinct fear upon their part that this bill, having the scope that it has, will have influence upon State legislation, and that this amendment will take off that influence from the State legislatures and leave them perfectly free.

Mr. President, I will not argue with the Senator whether or not that fear and apprehension is well founded. I state merely that it is worthy of note and not to be neglected when it comes from a body of citizens as large and as singularly intelligent as are the Quakers, the Dunkards, and other people like them in the United States. They are a people who read, a people who think, and a people who constitute a very valuable element of our citizenship. Therefore I say that their opinions upon a subject of this kind are in themselves entitled to consideration and weight.

Since it is admitted on all hands that the amendment presented here can do no possible harm, and since the only objection urged against it is that perhaps it is surplusage, I do not see why it is that there is any objection to giving our concurrence to the clearly defined objection of this very large and exceedingly and unusually intelligent body of our fellow-citizens that they would be injured, both directly and indirectly, by the bill as it now stands.

I have nothing further to say upon the amendment, though I shall surely call for a vote upon it if it be not accepted by the committee.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator from Wisconsin does not give quite sufficient force to the language of the bill. I make the suggestion to him with great deference, because I am not, myself, as familiar with it as I ought to be before undertaking to discuss it, for my attention has been called to other matters which are pending. But, if I understand it, the first section of the bill describes who are to be the militia:

> Every able-bodied male citizen of the respective States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, etc.

All of those are now members of the militia by law. Whether a man so desires or not, it is proposed to make him a soldier by the law—the word "militia" means "soldiery," as I understand it—and without exception, if a man be within the two ages named in the bill, unless he be under the age of 18 or over the other limit, which is 45 years, he is a member of the militia. So a Quaker, who is conscientiously opposed to war, is made by law a soldier against his will. It seems to me we should not do that unless we wish to constrain a man against his conscience.

Besides that, the second section provides that certain persons shall be exempt from military service. You do not refrain from making that exemption by the fact that nobody is called upon for military duty, unless he has a mind to enter the service. The section exempts various executive and judicial officers, persons in the military and naval service, custom-house officers, clerks, postmasters, persons employed in the transportation of the mail, and other public officers. It also exempts members of the two Houses of Congress. Why should we not put in the provision offered by the Senator from Indiana? We put in all the other cases of the men defined by the lawmaking power as persons who ought to be exempted.

It does seem to me that the amendment of the Senator from Indiana is germane and that it is proper, unless we mean to make by law all these men soldiers against their conscience.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, the first clause of the bill, to which the distinguished Senator has referred, has not been at all changed. That is not new phraseology in this bill. It is the exact phraseology used in the original act of 1792, which has been upon our statute book ever since. I look upon it simply as a general definition in the most broad and general sense of what shall constitute the militia.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator whether in those laws there was not some exemption of the character now proposed?

Mr. QUARLES. No; I think not.

Mr. HOAR. I have been so informed, though I am not sure.

Mr. QUARLES. I think not.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, certain intelligent Quakers in my own State have called my attention to this matter. They have told me that all the early militia acts did contain an exemption of this character, and they supposed a similar provision not being in this bill was simply an oversight on the part of the framers of it.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, let us see whether we would have any jurisdiction to pass upon that question in its entirety. I suppose that the organization of the militia is a matter which pertains peculiarly to each State. It is a State force, not a Federal force until it has been called out, of course, in the manner indicated by the Constitution.

The exemptions that are contained in section 2 relate to Federal employees. We are protecting Federal employees against any act or regulation of the States which might take them away from their employment. That is clearly within our jurisdiction; but can we go beyond that? Can we dictate to the State of Massachusetts how she shall organize her own militia at home? I apprehend not, and I apprehend it will be found that the laws exempting Quakers and other religious persons, to which reference is made, are in the laws of the several States, and that they have never found any place in the Federal laws since 1792.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. If that be true, why is it that in the very first line of the bill there is a provision as to what the militia shall consist of?

Mr. QUARLES. That is simply following the old act.

Mr. HOAR. I know; but I now understand the Senator having departed from that reason is giving another; that is, that we should not make this exception because the States are to determine who shall constitute the militia, and it is not for us to do it. I ask him, then, if that be the purpose, why it is that he does undertake to determine by act of Congress who shall constitute the militia by saying that the militia shall consist of so and so, and not leave it to the States?

Mr. QUARLES. I suppose, Mr. President, that the framer of this bill took the old act as he found it on the statute book and undertook to define the two classes of militia, or the three classes, as it stood when the bill was originally introduced, following the exact language of the old law. But I will call the Senator's attention to the last part of section 2, which recognizes the power of the several States and Territories to determine the exemptions from militia duty by their own peculiar system of laws. Of course we recognize them, and have to recognize them; but it seems to me that to say that no State should incorporate into the militia a certain group of religious people, who live in the State of Indiana, for instance, would be beyond the scope of our jurisdiction. That, it seems to me, is a question purely for that State to determine in its own way.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, if my colleague will permit me, the militia of the United States seems to be also the militia of the States, that is, using the word in its generic sense. In the case of Houston v. Moore the court had occasion to pass upon this question. They say:

> So long as the militia are acting under the military jurisdiction of the State to which they belong, the powers over them are concurrent in the General and State governments. Congress has power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining them; and this power being unlimited, except in the two particulars of officering and training them according to the discipline to be prescribed by Congress, it may be exercised to any extent that may be deemed necessary by Congress. But as State militia, the power of the State governments to legislate on the same subject having existed prior to the formation of the Constitution, and not having been prohibited by that instrument, it remains with the States, subordinate nevertheless to the paramount law of the General Government operating upon the same subject.

It is, however, sui generis. Wherever there is concurrent jurisdiction, ordinarily the jurisdiction that first attaches excludes the other; but this seems to be to give to the States power to legislate as to the militia as a State militia, but subordinate to the power of Congress to organize, arm, and all that.

The question which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] puts is one which it seems to me is difficult to answer otherwise than he answered it; but Congress has power to provide for organizing, arming, etc., the militia. Does not that necessarily involve the power in Congress to say of what the militia shall consist, and does not this very bill provide what shall constitute the militia in the generic sense—the organized and the unorganized militia, every able-bodied citizen between certain ages? If Congress has not that power, would it not seem that that language is inappropriate in this bill? If Congress has the power, so that we may designate who shall constitute the militia and between what ages, does not that necessarily carry with it the jurisdiction to say who shall not be included in the militia without regard to ages?

I have not thought the amendment was one of importance. It does not make any particular difference whether it passes or does not pass, but I am not clear myself that Congress has not the power and jurisdiction to legislate upon this subject.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, in reference to the last remark of the Senator from Wisconsin as to the interest there may be in this amendment, there is a very large body of Quakers in the State of New York. I have received many communications from them, and they are very much alarmed as to the effect of this bill upon their society or church. It seems to me that it is a highly proper amendment to put on this bill, so as to quiet that alarm among those very worthy and intelligent people and excellent citizens. To prevent any misuse of this exception in case of war by societies being organized merely to escape military duty, I would suggest that in line 3 of this amendment there should be inserted "at present organized and existing," so that it would read:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to require or compel any member of any religious organization at present organized and existing, etc.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I think that is an admirable suggestion.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator recognizes the distinction of a man being a member of a sect, and being a member of some organization within the sect. There might perhaps hereafter be Quakers who would not belong to any particular organization, and yet would belong to a sect. Would you exclude them? In other words, would the exemption be limited to them?

Mr. DEPEW. I would say for the safety of the militia it ought not to be left to the judgment of any individual citizen who wants to escape military duty to declare to the enrolling officer or to the drafting officer that his religious scruples are against fighting.

Mr. SPOONER. No, but if he joined the organization and became a Quaker, which he could not become without some action——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. He certainly could not become a Quaker without the consent of the Quakers, and he could not be a Quaker just by himself. This amendment, if the Senator will permit me, was carefully drawn with that end in view, so that some person could not come up and say "I am a Quaker," just on his own word. He has to belong to a religious organization as one of its registered members.

Mr. DEPEW. I have been familiar with the Quakers all my life, and I think there is no religious organization or society which is so rigid in the examination of those who wish to become members as is that society; nor is there a more intelligent one, and in case of war if there were a rush to join the Quakers in order to be exempt from military duty the Quakers would show a vigor and patriotism in keeping them out which would be most commendable.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not underestimate the patriotism of the Quakers. There is no more intelligent or better class of people than the Quakers. The point I suggested to the Senator was that he limits the operation of this amendment to the organizations of Quakers in existence at the time of the passage of the proposed act. Suppose a new organization of Quakers should spring up after the passage of this act?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We exclude that by the amendment suggested by the Senator from New York.

Mr. DEPEW. The object of the amendment I propose is that in case of emergency persons could not organize religious societies in order to escape military duty.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It says "at present existing."

Mr. SPOONER. My suggestion was that, as I understand the amendment, it will exclude organizations of Quakers made subsequent to the passage of the act. Am I wrong about that?

Mr. DEPEW. It would.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I say a word?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. With the permission of the Senator from Wisconsin——

Mr. SPOONER. I thought when I rose that the Senator from New York had taken his seat.

Mr. DEPEW. I had.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Chair will recognize the Senator from Wisconsin and ask that Senator if he will yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SPOONER. Always, Mr. President.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I could not agree with the Senator from New York as to the organization of a new society of Quakers within the parent church. They could establish a new church in the parent sect. There is nothing to prevent that. But if a new and spurious organization of Quakers were gotten up for the express purpose of exempting cowards from participating in war, it would prevent that. However, your question was, Did it prevent any new organization of Quakers within the church?

Mr. SPOONER. Within the church?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly not; because it can extend its churches.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator kindly read the amendment again?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It does prevent any new or spurious organization.

Mr. DEPEW. I will read the whole of the amendment.

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to require or compel any member of any well-recognized religious sect or organization at present organized and existing, whose creed forbids its members to participate in war in any form, and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein, in accordance with the creed of said religious organization, to serve in the militia or any other armed or volunteer force under the jurisdiction and authority of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. I meant, in saying that I did not think the amendment was of any consequence, except in a sentimental way, that there is no compulsory feature in this bill, nor was there in section 24. No man under the provisions of this bill can be forced——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. In my opening and very brief remarks I said that may be so.

Mr. DEPEW. If I may be permitted, I see no harm in that exception in relieving the anxieties of these estimable people.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I think there ought to be one further, and perhaps a little more comprehensive, statement made in answer to my honorable friend, the Senator from Wisconsin on my right, than what has been said already. He asks why we do not leave the matter of exemption to the States. We have said that anybody exempted by State authority should be exempt from militia duty without regard to age. That is in the bill now. I understand that the policy of the people of the United States is to secure by national authority, against the local opinion and action of the States, the fundamental rights of religious and political freedom and of commercial integrity. We prohibit the States from impairing the obligation of contracts; we prohibit the States from trying a man twice for the same offense; we prohibit the States from conducting trials except with certain securities for fair trials, and the fourteenth amendment has very much extended those provisions, so that no man can be tried by any State without due process of law.

Now, suppose a State undertakes, against the conscience of an individual, to compel him to be a member of the militia and to enter into war. I think when the United States is dealing with that subject we should by our authority exempt him, State or no State. If it should happen that some State should exist hereafter, in the far East, or the far West, or the far North, or the far South, which had a very great prejudice against Quakers, and a war came up, and their opposition to war excited the popular feeling of the majority in the State, they should be protected.

Now, during the war of the Revolution the Quakers, although, as everybody in this debate has said, they are a worthy and patriotic body of people, incurred great animosity by their refusal to take part therein. Dr. Franklin, a man who did not yield much to sentimentalities, as they are called, speaks of them with great dislike and contempt in his writings.

I think it was Mad Anthony Wayne who, when his soldiers were hard up for shoes, heard of a great Quaker meeting which was being held one evening in the neighborhood, and marched up a body of troops, surrounded the Quaker meetinghouse, and made every man in the assembly pull off his shoes or boots or whatever he had on, and used them for his soldiers and left the Quakers to go home barefooted. I will not be sure it was General Wayne, but it was some well-known and famous and popular general in the Revolutionary war.

So it seems to me that as we are declaring who shall constitute the militia, giving definition, we ought to put in our law the definition and not leave it in the power of any State to force a man against his conscience to go into battle.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, if I thought the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] went as far as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] says it ought to go, I would not vote for it. I would not vote in favor of an amendment exempting any religious organization from military duty which provided that a State should not fix the qualifications of those to be exempted from military duty.

Now, the second section of the bill provides that the Vice-President and members of Congress and certain military officers shall be exempt from military duty, which is proper, for they are officers of the United States; and the second section also provides that such persons as the different States may exempt from military duty shall also be exempted. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana, as I understand it——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. The second section also includes pilots and ferrymen and sailors employed by any merchant vessel, and a great many persons not in the national service.

Mr. CLAY. I so understand. I have the second section before me, and I do not think that changes the idea I have of that section. It does refer to pilots and ferrymen, but these are employees of those employed by the National Government.

Mr. HOAR. No.

Mr. CLAY. It says:

SEC. 2. That the Vice-President of the United States, the officers, judicial and executive, of the Government of the United States, the members and officers of each House of Congress, persons in the military or naval service of the United States, all custom-house officers, with their clerks, postmasters and persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mail, ferrymen employed at any ferry on a post-road, artificers and workmen employed in the armories and arsenals of the United States, pilots, mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States, and all persons who are exempted by the laws of the respective States or Territories shall be exempted from militia duty, without regard to age.

My idea is that the Military Committee certainly intended to exempt from military duty certain persons and their employees employed by the National Government, and then to say to each one of the States that they should have the right to pass laws fixing other exemptions.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. That is as I construe the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Georgia a question?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. Does not the Senator omit in this statement, as he did in his first statement, the largest class of persons that are prescribed in that section, to wit, all mariners and pilots employed in private service having nothing to do with the United States Government? Are not the largest number of persons prescribed in that section persons not exempted because they are in the national service, but for other reasons?

Mr. CLAY. That is true; but I presume the committee intended to say that on account of the peculiar service these persons render in the maritime business Congress would take jurisdiction of them. But I desire to say, in regard to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, that if it provided that Congress should assume jurisdiction of these religious organizations, located in the different States, and provided that the States should not exempt them from military duty, I would not give it my support.

I think this amendment does not change the meaning of the bill in any particular. As I understand the amendment, if you adopt it it simply says that the act shall not be construed to compel members of the religious organizations to engage in military duty hereafter; and then the question whether or not they shall be exempt in Indiana or New York will be left to the legislatures of the States hereafter. I so construe it. I do not believe that if this amendment is adopted in its present shape it will deprive the legislatures of the different States of the Union of the power to fix the qualifications of the different classes who shall be exempt from military duty hereafter.

Reading the amendment, I believe it to be useless, but the Senator from New York and the Senator from Indiana say it will quiet these people who now believe that by the passage of this act we force them to perform military duty. If this is adopted, in my opinion it will leave the section of the bill just exactly where it stands, and will leave hereafter to the legislatures of the different States the question of fixing the classes which shall be exempt from military duty.

I had not read most carefully the section, and it does go further than I thought it went in regard to exemptions. I believe that Congress really ought not to undertake to exempt any class except those engaged in the service of the United States. The question of the organization of the militia ought to be left largely to the States, and the question of exemptions from military duty ought to be left largely to the States. If I had had the framing of this measure, I would have exempted by Congress no class except those employed by the Government of the United States. But for my part I can not see why the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana can possibly be of any harm, and really I do not believe it will change the meaning of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should be very sorry to have the amendment which I favor lose the vote of the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY], or any other Senator, but I think I ought to say that I can not agree with him in his construction of the amendment. If the soldiers be called into service and be compelled to serve, it is in consequence of this bill and of nothing else. The bill provides that the President shall order the State militia into the service. For instance, in the fourth section it is provided that whenever the United States is invaded or in danger of invasion or rebellion, the President may call them forth and issue orders to them. That is compulsion, and it is compulsion authorized by this bill, and it is the only compulsion under which these soldiers are constrained to go into the service and do the work.

Then the amendment says nothing in the act contained shall be construed to compel Quakers to serve (I will use that short phrase instead of the phraseology of the amendment) or other persons like them who are described in it. To say that there is nothing in the bill which compels them in any way does not address itself favorably to my understanding. It seems to me we ought to meet the important question of the right of conscience in the proper way, and in the way in which it has been met in the United States from the beginning of the Government of the United States, to wit: That persons belonging to religious bodies who have conscientious scruples against military service shall not be compelled to violate their conscience. It seems to me the proper place for that, the righteous thing to do, is in the act of Congress where we define the persons who shall be compelled by the United States to do that service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further amendments?

Mr. QUARLES. There is another amendment, notice of which was given, and it was printed and laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was one which related entirely to section 24.

Mr. QUARLES. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course that would not be in order now.

Mr. PETTUS. There is one amendment which has not been offered, but which has merely been printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does anyone offer the amendment?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not myself approve of the amendment and shall vote against it, but in order that it may be put before the Senate in the absence of its author, I will move it. I hope it will be understood that I offer the amendment on behalf of the author, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN]. I do not desire that the paternity of it should be ascribed to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia, for the Senator from Mississippi, offers the amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as new sections the following:

SEC. —. That it shall be unlawful for any officer to directly or indirectly give any command, order, or direction to any private soldier to perform any service for the private benefit or advantage of such officer or any other officer or person, and any officer charged with such unlawful conduct shall be tried by a court-martial, one-half the members of which court-martial shall be private soldiers of the same class of military service as the private soldier alleged to have been so unlawfully commanded, ordered, or directed, and upon conviction shall be cashiered.

SEC. —. That in every trial of a private soldier at least one-half of the members of the court-martial before whom such private soldier shall be tried shall be private soldiers of the same class of military service as the private soldier on trial.

SEC. —. That in every trial of an officer for an alleged offense for an alleged maltreatment or mistreatment of a private soldier, at least one-half of the members of the court-martial before whom such officer shall be tried shall be private soldiers of the same class of service as the private soldier against whom such offense shall be alleged to have been committed.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further amendments? This bill, when it was formerly under consideration, was reported to the Senate, and after it was in the Senate certain amendments were offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr.

COCKRELL] and agreed to. The amendments which have been submitted to-day have been offered in the Senate, and not as in Committee of the Whole. Will the Senate concur in the amendments reported from the committee to the Senate?

The amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, as I have had something to say about the bill, and in order to prevent any possible misconstruction as to my present attitude toward it, I desire to say that in its present shape I most heartily approve of it, and am satisfied that it is a very wise and efficient bill and will result in the great improvement of the militia and make it a most efficient arm of the Government. I hope the bill may be passed unanimously.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

COAL.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 388.

Whereas it is claimed that conditions exist involving great hardship, suffering, and distress by reason of the unprecedented scarcity of coal, and it is claimed that combinations or conspiracies exist in and concerning said trade tending to restrain interstate and foreign commerce: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries be, and is hereby, directed to investigate these said facts, charges, and necessities; to inquire into the elements and conditions involved in said coal trade, the cost of coal, the methods and facilities and cost of transportation and distribution of the same, and the reasons or causes of such scarcity and distress; that said committee make such investigations and report the testimony, with their conclusions thereon, as soon as possible, and that said committee have power and authority to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ or have the services of stenographers, clerks, and messengers, and incur such other expenses as may be deemed necessary; that meetings of the said committee be held in the Capitol building in Washington and in such other places as the committee shall determine, and the necessary expenses shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, on the usual vouchers," approved by the chairman of said committee: Provided, That said committee is authorized to sit during the session of the House, and may proceed to discharge the duties assigned either by the committee or by one or more subcommittees, and the action of the subcommittee of said committee shall be as valid as though done by the full committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, if I understand the effect of this resolution, it is to add to the powers given to the committee under the resolution which passed the House on yesterday.

Mr. GROSVENOR. On Monday.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It authorizes the committee, as I understand, to take testimony by a subcommittee as well as by the full committee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And furthermore, it gives power to sit during the sessions of the House, which was not in the former resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It does not extend the right to sit during the recess at all?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all. Of course it is understood its power will fall with the session of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman not think his resolution should provide that the committee should report before the adjournment of Congress?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It provides that they shall report as speedily as possibly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But that is ineffective.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentlemen will allow me, it must report before the adjournment of Congress, because it has no power after adjournment; and, furthermore, the gentleman will understand that the House will have entire control over the action of the committee so far as compelling a report or discharging the committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes, but under the rules of the House it would be impossible to bring that question before the House unless the gentleman's side desire it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope the gentleman will have confidence in the good faith of the committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have, but I suggest to the gentleman that he might relieve whatever of suspicion there might be if he amends his resolution by providing that the committee should report before Congress adjourns.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is the legal effect of the resolution as it stands.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not concur sometimes in the gentleman's legal conclusions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. GROSVENOR, the motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. MOODY of North Carolina indefinitely on account of sickness.

REBATE ON COAL.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution of the House, No. 381, have considered the same and recommend that it be agreed to, with an amendment, inserting in line 2, after the letters "H. R.," the number "16649," and also an amendment inserting after the word "consider," in line 2, the words "in the House."

"Resolved, That immediately on the adoption of this rule it shall be in order to consider H. R. ——, providing for a rebate of duties on coal; that debate thereon shall continue for not more than one hour, one-half hour on each side; that on the conclusion of the debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered, and vote taken upon the passage of the bill without delay or intervening motion.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, on the adoption of that rule, I ask the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the bill referred to in the rules is a very short one, and I will read it. It is entitled "A bill to provide rebate of duties on coal."

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to make full rebate of duties imposed by law on all coal of every form and description imported into the United States from foreign countries for the period of one year from and after the passage of this act.

The purpose of this bill, it will be observed, is really to put coal of all kinds on the free list during a period of one year subsequent to the passage of the act. There has been so much misrepresentation with respect to the duty on anthracite coal, and with respect to the manner with which it was imposed, that I think this is a favorable occasion, perhaps, to correct the misrepresentations that have been made, and to put in the RECORD a true statement by reciting the legislative history of the duty on coal.

When the Dingley bill was reported to the House in the first instance it contained a provision that coal, bituminous and shale, should pay a duty of 75 cents a ton, coal slack or culm 30 cents, and coke 20 cents. On the free list was this provision: "Coal, anthracite, and coal stores of American vessels, but none shall be unloaded."

The bill passed the House in the identical shape in which it had been reported, and was reported to the Senate in this form: "Coal and shale, 75 cents per ton; coal slack and culm, 30 cents per ton: Provided, however, That the duty on coal and shale shall be 60 cents per ton, and on coal slack or culm 15 cents per ton when imported from any country that does not impose on coal or coal slack or culm a higher rate of duty than those named in this proviso. Coke 20 cents." The free list read, "Coal stores of American vessels, but none shall be unloaded or discharged."

That was the shape in which the bill was reported to the Senate. As it passed the Senate it was amended so as to read this way:

Coal, bituminous, and all coals containing less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon, and shale, 67 cents per ton. Coal slack or culm, 15 cents per ton.

Then there was a proviso with respect to coal for fuel aboard vessels which I need not read. The free list read: "Coal stores of American vessels, but none shall be unloaded or discharged."

Now it will be observed that this provision for a duty on coal containing less than 92 per cent carbon was in the bill as it passed the Senate, and, of course, there could not be any concealment of the matter under that condition of things. But the bill was further amended in conference so as to read: "Coal, bituminous, and all coals containing less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon, and shale, 67 cents per ton." The free list read: "Coal, anthracite, not specially provided for in this act, and stores of American vessels, but none shall be unloaded."

In other words, it was undertaken to give a definition to anthracite coal, and it was provided that all coal, whether it was called anthracite or bituminous, that contained less than 92 per cent of carbon, should pay a duty of 67 cents a ton.

Now, this provision was not only not put in secretly, but was debated on the floor of the Senate. It was put in at the instance of representatives in the Senate and House from the Pacific coast in order to provide against coal brought in on the Pacific coast from Australia and British North America. In point of fact, so far as I know, there is no real anthracite coal in the world outside of Pennsylvania, unless possibly it be in China, and the anthracite coal of Pennsylvania contains more than 92 per cent of carbon, and is, therefore, now on the free list.

I need not say anything, Mr. Speaker, as to the necessity or the propriety of the passage of this bill at this time. The great coal strike in Pennsylvania is a matter of lamentable history. I learn this morning by a statement from an authentic source that during the five months of that strike the country was deprived of a supply of anthracite coal amounting to 24,000,000 tons. There could be only one result from such a condition of things; and that result has followed—a scarcity of coal, great and widespread suffering in the heart of midwinter, and a high price for the commodity.

Now, I want to say here and now, speaking for myself, that I do not believe that this legislation will introduce into the market an additional pound of coal. I do not believe that any coal will be imported that would not have been imported without the passage of this bill. I do not believe that it will have any appreciable effect upon the price of coal. I do not believe that any legislation can affect the greed and avarice of the cormorants who are taking advantage of the present condition to oppress people already oppressed. But it will do one thing—it will satisfy the great public that believes that Congress can do something; and it will show the disposition of Congress to do everything that it can do to alleviate this distress.

A friend near me suggests that it will satisfy the belief of the public; and whatever the result may be, Congress will at least have relieved itself of its responsibility. And the responsibility, let me say, rests with us right here, because under the Consitution the power to originate revenue legislation rests with the people's representatives in this House, and rests nowhere else.

Now, I am not disposed to take up any time in the further discussion of this bill. I hardly think it possible that anyone will want to consume time, to delay the passage of an emergency measure such as this, which is expected to bring relief to a suffering people. I can not conceive that under the circumstances anyone here or elsewhere will be disposed to talk politics.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me a suggestion before he takes his seat?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I agree with the gentleman in doubting whether this measure will bring any relief; but I think it will very injuriously affect the Pacific coast. Therefore I ask whether there is any reason why the operation of the bill should not be limited to the importation of coal into the Atlantic ports and the ports of the Great Lakes or the Gulf. If this bill would relieve the suffering now existing here in the East, I know my people would favor it. It will not; but, on the contrary, will threaten a great industry of my State and bring in competition with our well-paid labor the product of Chinese labor of Canada, and unless the operation of this bill can be confined to the Atlantic and lake ports I shall feel compelled to vote against it.

Mr. DALZELL. I think such legislation would be contrary to the constitutional provision which says that taxes shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I understand, this is a rebate proposition—the tax is to be collected and then returned. Of course, in effect it amounts to the same thing.

Mr. DALZELL. It is in effect a discount. You may call it whatever you please. It in fact puts coal on the free list for a year.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is the effect of it, certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. I doubt now—speaking only for myself—whether or not we can make a provision of that kind applicable to the Atlantic ports and not applicable to the Pacific coast.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That would be the objection to a proposition of that kind?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MONDELL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] whether the committee considered the proposition of limiting the operation of the provisions of this bill to six months rather than a year, and I ask this question because, in my opinion, the passage of the bill will very injuriously affect the coal industry of my State without being any relief to any of the people now suffering. The gentleman himself has already stated that he does not believe it would bring any relief——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We should like very much to hear what the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is saying. I hope we shall have order.

The SPEAKER. All gentlemen will be seated, and will cease conversation.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand fully the demand for this legislation, but in view of the fact that, in the gentleman's opinion, this measure will bring no relief, and the further fact that it will injuriously affect great interests, I ask him whether or not the committee has considered the propriety of limiting the operation of the law to six months. Much less injury would come from a bill so limited.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Wyoming, I will say that the committee did consider that question, and that in the first instance it was intended——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We can not hear a word that the gentleman is saying.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order.

Mr. DALZELL. The committee did consider the question of time, and in the first instance was of opinion, pretty generally, I think, that six months would be a proper period. But after further consideration, taking into account all the facts, the committee came to the conclusion that it would be better that this legislation should expire while Congress was in session. If limited to six months the effect of the law would end when Congress is not in session. It is absolutely impossible for us to tell what is going to happen in the future with respect to the coal trade.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, if the committee considers the fact of its being a good measure for twelve months I would ask the gentleman if the committee considered the further fact of its being a good measure for all time?

Mr. DALZELL. Well, the committee was very thoroughly of the opinion that it would not be a good measure for all time. Of course I understand now that the gentleman is simply violating, as I assumed a while ago would not be done, a rule which I assumed would be adopted; that is to say, to avoid playing politics on this emergency measure.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There is no politics in it.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. DAYTON. I would ask if the committee in looking into this matter did not find that the greatest trouble was to secure the transportation of coal to the markets where it was needed, and if considering it in that light they took into consideration a plan to suspend temporarily the operations of the interstate-commerce law which would permit the coal-hauling railroads to haul coal to the exclusion of other freight without being subjected to the penalty of that law?

Mr. DALZELL. I will say to my friend that that matter was not considered by the committee or brought to its attention. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania has correctly stated what would be the effect of the adoption of the pending rule. It will be to bring the House without amendment to an immediate vote after one hour of general debate upon the bill which makes a rebate on all coal for a period of twelve months. I believe, as the rule is drawn, Mr. Speaker, if the present occupant of the chair holds as he has held on former occasions similar to this, that it will even prevent a motion to recommit this bill with instructions to the Committee on Ways and Means. The resolution is so drawn as to prevent any amendment whatever to be offered to the measure, and it will also prevent, as I have stated, a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions that some different legislation may be proposed. In this respect, Mr. Speaker, it is a most unusual rule. I grant you that rules somewhat similar have been adopted heretofore by the House of Representatives, but when the great question of taxation is before the House and the country, and a live question as it is to-day, such a rule ought not to be invoked.

Now, then, as to the effect of this bill, if it shall pass. It is interesting, Mr. Speaker, to note the differences of opinion entertained and expressed by the great doctors of economy on the other side of the House. The able gentleman who presents this rule tells us that it will not have any effect whatever upon the importation of coal into this country, that it will not affect the price, that it will not have any effect upon the importation of coal, while equally learned doctors on that side arise in their place and tell us that it will destroy the coal industry in their respective States, or greatly damage it. They not only say so on the floor here, but they say so in the public prints, if we are to depend upon what we see published in the newspapers of this morning.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. As I understand it, this legislation is intended to relieve a condition which exists throughout the Eastern and Atlantic States. When I stated that the legislation would injure the industry in my State, I spoke what I believed to be the truth. There has been no demand for a reduction of duty in that region, and there is no one asking any relief there, even admitting that this measure will bring relief anywhere, which I do not.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman asked me to yield for a question and not for a speech. Now, I will ask him a question. Does he believe that this rebate or this taking the tariff tax off coal will reduce the price of coal in his State?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not believe it will.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then how will it injure your coal producers?

Mr. MONDELL. It will have the effect of allowing Chinese-mined Canadian coal to seek the market now held by the coal mined in my State.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will it reduce the price of coal to your people?

Mr. MONDELL. No, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then what is the objection to other coal coming in?

Mr. MONDELL. It will place in competition with our coal in the markets——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Well, but the gentleman stated it would not reduce the price.

Mr. MONDELL. Canadian-mined coal—and reduce our markets.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Answer the question: Will it reduce the price of coal? And if not, why does the gentleman object to other coal coming in?

Mr. MONDELL. It will possibly reduce a little the price of our coal in some of the markets which it seeks, but I doubt it. It will, however, even though the price is not reduced, let in a large quantity of Canadian coal, thus reducing our market.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is all right. This admission is all we ask. Then we have that much confessed even by a protective-tariff man, that if you reduce the tax and reduce the tariff on an article it reduces the price to the consumer. [Applause.] This is Democratic doctrine and is common sense. I congratulate the gentleman on this confession.

I am glad to notice that some of this applause comes from the Republican side. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that as this rule is drawn, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] will be denied the opportunity to offer his amendment to this bill, limiting the time of injury to his constituents to six months. They must stand it for twelve months. And yet when the gentleman goes home he will say to his constituents, "Why, I could not help it. We could not offer an amendment to the bill reducing the time you are to be injured." They may not think to ask him why he could not offer an amendment, but if they do, he will have to tell them that the reason he could not offer an amendment to stop this injury at the end of six months was because he voted to tie his own hands, to prevent himself from offering such an amendment. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now are you going to do that?

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow me for a moment?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Why, certainly, if you want to ask a question, not to make a speech.

Mr. MONDELL. I will also say to them that if I voted with gentlemen on the other side against the rule it would result in an attempt at an amendment that would give us not free coal for a year, but free coal for all time to come. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am very much obliged to my friend, Mr. Speaker. I could not have stated it better than that. The gentleman's side of the House has about 200 members. We have about 160 on this side. What does the gentleman say? That but for this ironclad rule, but for this severe rule, enough Republicans on that side of the House would have their consciences so moved and operated upon that they would join with gentlemen on this side of the House and give relief to a suffering people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, is not that a beautiful position for gentlemen on that side of the House to take and voluntarily place themselves in? That is just what I was going to argue, Mr. Speaker, as a Democrat and as a Representative sitting upon this side of the Chamber, but the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], voicing the sentiment of his people, has saved me from arguing at length that view of the case.

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] says that it will not affect the market, that it will have no effect upon coal importations.

Mr. Speaker, not only does the gentleman from Wyoming differ from my friend from Pennsylvania, but other Republicans in this country differ from him. The great Republican Secretary of the Treasury differs radically with my friend from Pennsylvania. Why do I say that? Because in the month of October, when the exigency was upon this country, when the coal strike was prevailing, and an important election pending, the Secretary of the Treasury, in effect, substantially gave direction to the customs officers of this country to repeal or to nullify the present tariff law laying a tax upon coal. I say he substantially nullified it. He directed them, in effect, not to administer the law on the statute books, and placed there by the Republican party. So that when the Secretary of the Treasury wanted to give a little relief to a suffering people he found it necessary to nullify the Republican law on the statute books, which ought to be repealed to-day in full. If the repeal of this tax on coal would not help the people who consume coal, why did the Secretary of the Treasury give orders for its virtual suspension?

I say, Mr. Speaker, that this bill does not go far enough. We say that instead of a suspension or a rebate for twelve months the entire law should be repealed and the people given the relief which the Secretary of the Treasury undertook to give them by nullifying the law, and which the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] says they will get under this law if it is passed.

In the Committee on Ways and Means we undertook to pass amendments to the pending bill. We sought to indefinitely extend the twelve months' limit. That was voted down. We sought to solve the problem by placing coal upon the free list. That was voted down. With the bill presented to us in this shape there is nothing for us to do but vote for it as a final resort. We can not and would not defeat it if we could by our votes, but, Mr. Speaker, when there are great exigencies in this country, when there are great emergencies, when great afflictions come, it is interesting to note the fact that the Republican party always resort to Democratic theories of government in order to bring relief to a suffering people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am not outside of history when I tell you that when we have great fires in this country, as we had in a city in Maine at one time, and as we had in the great city of Chicago in 1871, when the people there were smitten by Providence, and great distress prevailed, the Republican party at once resorted quickly to Democratic measures of relief in order to assist the suffering people. [Applause.] They provided at once as a measure of relief for those afflicted that all the supplies necessary for rebuilding should be placed upon the free list. And, mark you, that was when we had too much fire. But now, Mr. Speaker, when we can not get any fire at all, and the people are freezing to death, the Republican party again rushes to Democratic theories in order to afford relief. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The country will yet find that only in Democratic theories and policies is there perfect safety for the Republic at all times and under all conditions.

Now, why not do what we ought to do? Why not do what many Republicans on that side of the House promised their people in the campaign last year they would do, and that is give the people some relief from the onerous taxes under which they suffer? But instead of coming forward as you should have done at this session and passed a tariff bill reducing the tariff, so as to give relief to many industries of this country, thereby destroying, or at least reducing, the power of trusts to oppress the people, you come forward now, when you are compelled to modify the tariff, and you do it in this indirect, halting, and insincere way. You are afraid to permit amendments to be offered to the bill, as the gentleman from Wyoming says if you give a chance to amend this measure the people's representatives might vote more relief than you give in the pending bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to undertake to tell here, for I have not time, how this provision got into the Dingley tariff law. My friend from Pennsylvania found it necessary this morning, when no one had made a statement on this floor to-day, to come to the relief of the framers of this law. Well, now, he need not undertake to get up a wrangle or a row with anyone on this side of the House upon that question. I quote the language of an able and honorable gentleman who for years occupied a seat on that side of the Chamber, personally known to us all as an honorable and able man. In debate, as he was reported at the time, in the State of Michigan, I think it was, he said that this provision for coal was "sneaked" into the Dingley tariff bill.

Now, he has never denied that statement, so far as I know, and it has been published far and wide over this country. It was "sneaked," he said, "in a cowardly manner into the Dingley bill." If you want your row, take it with the Secretary of the Navy. It seems that nobody has denied the allegation that this provision was sneaked into the Dingley bill, but whether it was or not, Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary now to discuss. The question is, Ought it to be there? And these gentlemen by their action now come forward and are compelled to confess that it ought not to be there in the present exigency, and they themselves ask relief from their own law for a period of twelve months.

How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Speaker, I can not go further in a discussion of this question. I only want to say this, that in my judgment this House ought to vote down this rule in order that we may present this measure in a better shape for the people. We can not offer to amend it under the rule; we can not make any change whatever in the bill, and must take it as it is if we adopt this resolution. The rule is unnecessary. The bill is itself privileged, and could have been called up under the rules at any time, but under the rules when so called up it would be open to amendment. This rule is only designed and intended to prevent the offering of amendments. Therefore we should vote down the rule, in order that the people of this country may have absolute and complete relief from the oppression of this "sneaking provision" in the Dingley tariff bill. Let us put coal where it ought to be—on the free list. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, this is either a good bill or it is a bad bill. If it is a good bill, it is because after its passage the price of coal is going to be reduced to the people who are now suffering. If the price of coal is going to be reduced to the people now suffering, it will be because the tariff tax has been removed. Now, I believe that all men of common sense, when they are faced with an actual situation, do believe that a reduction of a tariff tax will have a tendency to cheapen in the market the article upon which the tax has been levied. I can not conceive that anybody would oppose a bill of this sort in an emergency like this, unless he were one of the class of people who think that it is better that a great number of men and women and children should freeze, or be acold at any rate, than that a few people should make less profit upon invested capital for a very short while.

Now, Mr. Speaker, such extreme haste to do a thing so long delayed, and so unjustifiably delayed, has seldom been witnessed. The gentleman from Pennsylvania tells us that this is an emergency measure, and so it is; but it is no new emergency. It is not a sudden emergency. It has been an emergency since the House met upon the first Monday of December. [Applause.] Gentlemen can not now wait or delay long enough to let the House vote upon an amendment; can not wait long enough to let the representatives of the people propose or vote upon amendments. Now, the people themselves understand how things certainly are, and yet they have waited with their hands folded from the 1st day of December until now, to do what? To do partially and haltingly, hesitatingly and apologetically, as the gentleman's remarks bear witness, that which the Democratic party and that which all sound-thinking people of this country have been calling upon them to do ever since Congress met—to take the tariff off anthracite coal. True, the bill removes or suspends the tax for only a year. But going that far admits the principle for which we have contended and the efficacy of the remedy which we have suggested.

Now, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the severest possible arraignment of the authors of existing industrial conditions and policies consists in the statement, which is true, that this bill—poor, halting thing—"lame and impotent conclusion" as it is, is infinitely better than the present condition of things. We live in one of the richest countries of the world. We live in a country which has sent anthracite coal—at any rate the late Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Vanderlip, says so—to Newcastle itself. And yet we have by our laws gotten ourselves—mining coal of that sort as cheaply as we have mined it—into a position where men in the most highly civilized cities of the world to-day, New York, Chicago, Boston, and Philadelphia, are shivering not only with physical cold, but with anxiety for their wives and their children, and when the relief was begged this House and the Senate sat idly by until a month and a half of winter is gone and its accompanying sufferings been experienced before they give it, and then give it but temporarily and haltingly. It is now the 14th of January. No coal will come from abroad for a month and——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. How much time has the other side occupied, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The other side has occupied all of their time.

Mr. DALZELL. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this rule, but I shall vote against the proposed legislation. I vote for the rule knowing that the gentlemen on the Democratic side who vote against it do so with the hope and expectation of being able to pass legislation through the House placing coal upon the free list. I shall do all that I can when the time comes to prevent the passage of the bill, but I prefer to have the measure considered as it now stands, rather than to court the danger of permanently placing coal on the free list as desired by the gentlemen on the Democratic side.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, it will be useless at this time to undertake to enter into a tariff discussion, or to undertake to answer the threadbare argument that comes from gentlemen on the other side on that subject. When they passed their measure of perfidy and dishonor it contained a duty on coal. There is no distinction between the theories of the two parties on that subject; it is merely a question of a few cents in amount of duty.

Now, it is less than fair for the gentleman from Tennessee to repeat here the alleged words of the Secretary of the Navy with respect to the duty on coal. The Secretary of the Navy, subsequent to making that speech, made another speech in New England in which he conceded that he had been misled and in which he has put himself right. Now, mark the attitude of the other side. The gentleman from Mississippi is full of haste, but the gentleman from Tennessee complains that we will not let him play politics here; allow him to put in the time that ought to be spent in passing this bill in offering fruitless amendments that could amount to nothing, and then, after they had all been voted down, permit him to make a motion to recommit. The hypocrisy of the attitude of the gentlemen on the other side was never more apparent than it is as demonstrated by the gentleman from Tennessee to-day. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes had it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I demand a division, Mr. Speaker.

As the House was proceeding to divide,

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, is this vote upon the amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then I withdraw my demand.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee withdraws his demand. The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question was taken; and there were on a division (demanded by Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee)—ayes 136, noes 110.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 144, nays 116, answered "present" 6, not voting 88; as follows:

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask whether the gentleman from California, Mr. LOUD, has voted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HEPBURN). He has not.

Mr. GRIGGS. Then I wish to withdraw my vote and be recorded "present."

Mr. GRIGGS was so recorded.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to be entered "present," and to state that I am paired with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. HOPKINS. If he were present, I should vote "no."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Did the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] answer when his name was called?

Mr. SWANSON. I did not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that under those circumstances the gentleman's name can not be entered.

Mr. SWANSON. I simply wanted to be entered "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman could be entered as "present," he could then change that response to a vote. The gentleman does not state that he was listening when his name was called and failed to hear it.

Mr. SWANSON. It was my impression that ever since the Fifty-first Congress the rule has been that a member present has the right to be entered "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. When a quorum fails to vote that would be the rule.

Mr. SWANSON. The simple question is as to the right of a member who is present to be entered "present." I understand the Chair to rule that, unless the member was listening when his name was called and failed to hear it, he can not be entered "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to make full rebate of duties imposed by law on all coal of every form and description imported into the United States from foreign countries for the period of one year from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Chair to call my attention to the fact after I have occupied ten minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to control the time on one side and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] to control the time in opposition. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, it is useless, of course, to comment upon the lamentable strike that occurred last summer.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the statement of the Chair in respect to the division of time. Will the Chair please repeat?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair said that he would recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to control the time in favor of the bill and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] to control the time in opposition.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the only correction I desire to make to the statement of the Chair is that I do not control any time in opposition to the bill. I control one-half of the time, and I accept it as one-half of the time; but I can not accept it as one-half of the time in opposition to the bill, for I am not opposed to it, nor is any other gentleman on this side of the House, so far as I know.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will be recognized.

Mr. PAYNE. Gentlemen well know, Mr. Speaker, that the coal strike continued for a period of five months, that it covered nearly the whole anthracite region of the country, and that during that time very little coal was produced, so that out of the 67,000,000 tons annually mined in the anthracite regions, there was a shortage of at least 24,000,000 tons as has been recently stated. This amounts to nearly 8 per cent of the entire production of coal in the United States, both anthracite and bituminous. When this session commenced, or after it had commenced, several bills were introduced for the abolition of the duty, or the suspension of it, for sixty or ninety days or six months, for a drawback of the duty, and presenting other propositions, and I think that occasionally there were perhaps one or two bills introduced for the entire repeal of the duty upon coal; but the situation then was not so acute as it has become since.

Every day since operations have been resumed at the mines the situation has grown more acute. At first we were told we would have plenty of coal when the mines were in full operation. So far as my own locality is concerned the situation there has been growing better. There is more coal, and I am informed to-day that every man can have coal delivered at $6.50 a ton, which is but 75 cents a ton higher than it was a year ago; so that there has not been this emergency for the passage of any bill until since we met after the holiday recess. The Ways and Means Committee took the matter up and concluded that the best form and the best way to meet this emergency was by a bill granting a rebate upon duties for the period of a year. As has been said, in the case of the Chicago fire a rebate of all duties was granted upon everything used in building there except lumber, and in the case of the Eastport, Me., fire a rebate of duties was granted upon lumber alone. Those were emergencies.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] says that we adopted Democratic doctrines. Why, no; to meet an emergency is not Democratic doctrine. It was not Democratic doctrine to meet an emergency even when the floods devastated the South and destroyed life and property there. The appropriations we then made were not in accord with Democratic doctrine. The Democrats voted for it then, and at the same time they were talking about the Constitution and the constitutional rights of Congress to appropriate money to aid sufferers in the South. The Republican party has always stood to aid these people whenever the necessity occurred, and they have dragged some Democrats into voting with them upon these questions, but it was not Democratic doctrine. I did not intend, however, Mr. Speaker, and should not have said a word about those matters, if politics had not been brought in by the other side. I simply want to know whether this bill is sufficient to meet the emergency in this case.

I do not believe we are going to get more coal into this country or that we are going to get it cheaper in this country. It may be that while a few benevolent people have clubbed together in some towns and are importing coal direct and bringing it into this country and selling it at cost, that they will sell that coal to the poor people in their localities with the duty taken off, but the difficulty with the price of coal to-day is that there are so many men in the United States who are willing and anxious to make money out of the necessities of their fellows. Now, I do not know where we can place the blame in this case. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] says that he blames it upon the interstate-commerce law. That is the first time I have heard that idea suggested.

I understand that the railroads lay the blame upon the independent mine operators, that they are charging too much for their coal, and that the mine operators lay the blame upon the people in the locality—the retail dealers in coal. I think it may be that all of them are somewhat to blame, and all of them are more or less seeking the opportunity to make something out of the sufferings of their fellow-men and out of the scarcity of coal. I am willing, in order to relieve the situation in the way that some people believe it can be relieved, to go to the extent of the passage of this emergency bill.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I can not be interrupted. I have only ten minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York declines to be interrupted.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman does not seem to be anxious to hear what I have to say.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted I was about to say that the imports of coal into the United States during the past two years were 2,000,000 tons per year. They were about double what they were after our friends put a 40-cent duty upon it in 1894. They have increased that much under the increased duty of the Dingley law. And while we are importing this amount of coal, a large portion of which has come from the British North American possessions, we have been exporting into Canada and into the other British possessions, mainly into Canada, some 6,000,000 tons a year.

We have not exported so much there this year because of the strike, which cut off the supply of anthracite coal. They are feeling the scarcity of coal in the British possessions north of us. Similar conditions, though not to a degree of famine, obtain there, and I do not look for a large supply of coal under any circumstances from the British North American possessions. We may get some from the United Kingdom. Possibly this may in some way bring more coal to us from the United Kingdom. If that is so, I shall rejoice as heartily as anyone over the success of this measure in that direction. But we bring it forward simply as an emergency measure. We do not bring it forward as expressing our ideas upon the question whether there shall be a duty upon coal. We do not bring it forward with that idea, Mr. Speaker, because of the conditions on the Pacific coast, because of the conditions in the State of Wyoming, because of the conditions where our white labor in the mines is brought into direct competition with the Chinese labor in the British North American and Western possessions. I add some figures with reference to the exports and imports of coal.

Coal, anthracite and bituminous, imported from United Kingdom, Dominion of Canada (Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, etc.; Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, etc., and British Columbia), Mexico, Japan, British Australasia, Germany, and Chinese Empire, and total United States imports, for the years ending June 30, 1894-1902, inclusive.

NOTE.—The figures for November, 1902, are from advance sheets, Bureau of Statistics, Treasury.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX].

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, I have been listening very carefully to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. PAYNE], and also to the gentleman on the Committee on Rules [Mr. DALZELL]. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] charged the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] with playing the hypocrite. If you gentlemen over there believe what you have said, and if I understand what the term "skullduggery" means, that is exactly what you have been guilty of in this measure. [Laughter.] You come in here proposing as an emergency measure to relieve the people, as you say, and at the same time insisting that it will not do so. Now what do you think about that for hypocrisy? Have they not got cheek? They say, "We are satisfied it is not going to do any good. We know it will not reduce the price of coal, but nevertheless it is an emergency measure, and we do not expect that anybody will stand in the way. In other words, we will just shove it right through, at the same time stating that it is going to do no good, and that it will not reduce the price of coal."

What about that for hypocrisy? That is another one of those deceptions of the people, doing no good, not expected to do any; and yet you propose to fool the people into thinking that you are going to do something for them. I think when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] stated that it would not have any immediate effect on the price of coal, he was correct in his statement; for when coal is selling in Washington to-day at $8 a ton wholesale, and retailing anywhere from $10 to $15 a ton, I can not understand why people in Canada and elsewhere do not import their coal into this country and pay the tariff thereon. That is the strange thing to me, if that is true. It shows that the trouble is evidently somewhere else—perhaps the railroads.

But, Mr. Speaker, when we stand in this House to-day and insist on putting coal upon the free list, I want it understood that so far as I am concerned, at least, one Democrat knows that it requires revenue to run this Government; that we have got to levy a tax or a tariff upon something in order to produce sufficient revenue to run the country. I know that; but I undertake to say that if the experience of this country in the last twelve months has taught us anything, it is that coal ought to be on the free list. Gentlemen have done well, so far as that is concerned, in extending this time until the meeting of the next Congress. I agree with them on that. How do we know that in less than three months this strike will not be again repeated?

I notice in the newspapers this morning, and also from the statements of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], that 24,000,000 tons of coal that ought to have been mined and now available in the country is not there, and has not been mined, by reason of a strike of the coal miners. Who knows when this strike is going to begin again? How do you know that it may not occur next year, or this year, and be more extensive than it ever has been? And if there is one thing that the people must have, that one thing is coal. It is an absolute necessity. If there was nothing more in it than to provide other places where we may get coal while these strikes are on, we ought to have coal on the free list, so that we can get it from somewhere. We can not compel these people to dig coal. They will dig coal if they want to, or they will let it alone.

This thing had gone so far that it was proposed in some quarters by some of the ablest men in this country that the Government should take hold of this matter and condemn these coal mines and operate them for the public welfare.

The trouble about it is that you do not extend it long enough. In my judgment it ought to be on the free list, to counteract just such a condition as exists to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, it would be interesting to know precisely where the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] first felt the thrill of sympathy for shivering humanity which led to the explosion we have just listend to. Possibly had the magnitude of the emergency he talks about impressed itself upon him earlier, he could have told us about it without such a display of vehemence, not to say of emotion. However, it is commendable that even at this late date he has come to a realization of the fact that it is our duty to at least try to relieve that situation. Over thirty days ago, I think as much as forty days ago, I introduced a joint resolution precisely similar in import to the measure now before the House.

I went to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. PAYNE] and asked him if his committee did not regard it as advisable to consider and favorably report that resolution. An appalling danger threatened millions of people in his own State, yet a smile and an insinuation that there was no likelihood of any such action was his reply. It seems to have required numerous deaths from cold and exposure and the clamor of his own people for justice to arouse him, and now he comes here and says that while he does not think the passage of this resolution will do any good, he believes that Congress should do all within its power. Six months ago, not now, was the time for action.

The failure of the President to do his duty then made certain the appalling situation of to-day. When he was galloping over the country talking about regulating the trusts, he knew that his Attorney-General, although in possession of evidence enough to convict the lawbreakers who manage the coal combine in Pennsylvania, was making no efforts to protect the people from the great injury they have suffered. The fat fryers to whom you gentlemen owe your seats [applause on the Democratic side] are in charge of the Government, and who believes that fat fryers and their beneficiaries will ever move effectively against monopoly?

The President and his Attorney-General know as well as they know they are living that three or four railroads own the anthracite coal mines in Pennsylvania and are carrying on business in direct violation of the statutes of that State and the antitrust laws of the United States. Everybody knows that if the sheriffs and marshals would lay their hands upon these rich lawbreakers as they do in the case of petty lawbreakers, the atmosphere could be cleared in thirty days.

And think of the proposition that the interstate-commerce law is accountable for the distress resulting from the anthracite coal strike! Why, when the interstate-commerce bill was passed, the Supreme Court, that immaculate tribunal which, we are told, must not be criticized, forthwith drew its teeth and claws by depriving it of all useful plenary powers, and its most vital features were thereby destroyed. Every report of the Interstate Commerce Commission from that day to this has asked Congress to amend the law so as to empower the Commission to deal with just such lawlessness as that practiced by this coal trust, but the law remains unamended.

Presidents have found time to make loud declamations against trusts and combinations, but they have never found time to call upon Congress to perform this plain duty. The organization of monopolies goes on, publicly and notoriously, with not a finger lifted to prevent it. Gentlemen, monopoly means extortion, and the extent of its outrage will always be measured by the possibilities of the situation.

Ordinarily, monopoly means inordinate profits. In situations such as we are dealing with it means barefaced robbery. Meantime, I reiterate the statement that lawbreakers like Mr. Baer, the great and good men who claim to hold the right to operate monopolies by divine right, go unwhipped.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN. In one-half minute more I want to say if this measure will not affect the price of coal, why not put it on the free list permanently? [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE].

[Mr. GOLDFOGLE addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HEPBURN). The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], acting for the dominant party, has presented and caused to be adopted a rule, not alone limiting debate on this bill, but also providing that after debate the vote shall be taken and no intervening motion or amendment shall be allowed. Now, what is the real purpose of this rule?

Was it adopted because the well-known leaders on the left lack confidence that the members of their party would fail to vote down any amendment or motion they did not want? Oh, no; it was adopted to prevent record votes, indicating opposition to tariff revision, and also for the purpose of enabling members, when they return to outraged constituents, to hide behind the proposition that this rule had been adopted and that they had voted for the best measure of relief offered.

It is thus year after year the people are deceived. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe in the abdication of legislative functions on the part of Congress at any time or in any measure, but it has often been the policy of the dominant party to embody in tariff laws some such provision as this, which I will read, and after I have read it I want to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], who has charge of this measure, why he did not add such a provision as an additional section to this bill:

SEC. 2. The President shall have the power and it shall be his duty if at any time after the expiration of one year after the passage of this act, he shall be satisfied that any agreement or combination has been entered into or understanding reached by and between the railroad companies engaged in the transportation of coal, or the owners or operators of the coal mines, or by reason of any strike or strikes, the effect of which is to increase the price of coal, to immediately suspend the duty prescribed in section 1415, Schedule N, of the tariff act of July 24, 1897.

Why do you not place anthracite coal on the free list?

Next year winter will come again, and the same conditions, the same combinations, the same indifference to public opinion, the same disregard of the public good which brought about the present deplorable conditions may present themselves, and again suffering and death will follow.

Why do you not make provision for permanent relief?

I will answer for you; for the same reason that the gentleman did not embody a section like that I have read in this bill. Because the great monopoly that controls coal in this country would not stand for it. The servants of the trusts did not dare to go against the bidding of their masters.

The question which has been raised by this extortion practiced by the coal monopoly presents only a phase of the trust issue. You have approached it haltingly. Such conduct on your part was to be expected. It is natural that you should deal with the trust issue hesitatingly and haltingly. You have full knowledge that the interests of the great masses of the people are arrayed on one side of this issue and the interests of those who put you in control of this Government's affairs and retain you there are on the other. You are between the devil and the deep blue sea. You can not run with the hare and at the same time stay with the hounds.

In the case in hand, when a remedy was really sought it seems there was but little trouble in finding it. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] says he don't know where we can place the blame in this case. He hesitates between the railroads, the mine operators, and the retail dealers. If he is in doubt, he need not be. I will tell him where to place it. The real responsibility rests at the door of the Republican party.

Its absolute refusal to correct conditions which have resulted in rapid trust breeding within the past few years brings all these troubles. You are afraid to deal honestly with this great problem.

Within six days of the adjournment of the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress you rushed through this House an antitrust measure which possessed some good features. We on the right then charged that you were insincere—that the measure would die where it was intended it should die, in the Senate end of this Capitol. During the national campaign which followed, this bill was constantly referred to as what the Republican party proposed to do with the trust question, but when the short session came it was not even remotely alluded to by any member of the dominant party. However, it served its purpose.

Your record on this issue is one of hesitancy and double dealing. The only statute on the books relating to trusts bears the name of a Republican who voted against it, and it in fact, is in the main, the handiwork of a distinguished Democrat.

Surely there should be no hesitancy to take action against trusts, these menaces to the public good when one is brought to a full realization of the rapidity with which they are increasing, not alone in numbers, but in their ability to do harm.

The venerable senior Senator from Massachusetts, however poor he may be in practice, has lost none of his power to preach of the evil manifestations in our body politic. He has recently pointed out what the modern trust means. He says it means:

1. Destruction of competition;
2. The management of local industries by absentees in the interest of absentee capital;
3. Destruction of local public spirit;
4. Fraudulent capitalization;
5. Secrecy;
6. Management for the private benefit of the officials;
7. The power to corrupt elections, and in some cases to corrupt the courts;

And which he might have added, is often used, conspicuously in the Presidential contests of 1896 and 1900.

8. The want of personal responsibility to public sentiment;

And he might have added disregard of the public good.

9. The absence of personal liability for contracts or wrongdoing;
10. The holding of vast properties in mortmain—in the "dead hand," if we may use the ancient phrase of the English law. But it has life enough for all purposes of power to serve the will that wields it. It is dead only to the influence of any nerve which comes from the brain or heart of the people.

Congress will enact this measure of temporary relief as against one of these cruel monopolies, but what will you do to relieve the people from the oppression of the horde of "infant industries" which have developed into giant trusts and are feeding upon them? Let us examine the recent utterances of the chief exponent of your party's views and see if we can gather light.

One of two conclusions is forced upon any intelligent person who attempts to follow the development of the President's views on this great question.

Either he has no settled convictions regarding a correct remedy for this great evil, or he is afraid to announce his real views and seeks to mislead or involve in doubt anyone who attempts to ascertain the bent of his mind.

From the time we find him speaking so glibly in Minneapolis, in September, 1901, about "shackling, cunning, etc.," to his latest utterances on this subject, in his message sent to Congress at the beginning of this session, we find him, if the press has quoted him correctly, advocating different remedies at different times. At one time he urges the immediate adoption of a constitutional amendment increasing the power of the General Government to deal with this subject.

This suggestion, after the scathing denunciation of same by the junior Senator from Massachusetts, who emphatically stated that it was thoroughly impractical if not absurd, seems to have been at once abandoned. Next we find him advocating publicity as the real cure-all to be resorted to; but a careful reading of his message would indicate that some influence had been brought to bear which brought about on his part a change of faith in that policy as a remdial measuere.

When the suggestion is made that a revision of the tariff so as to reduce all tariff charges which serve "to shelter monopoly" might afford a remedy, the President rushes forward with a suggestion that we create "a permanent tariff commission," whose duty would be, I suppose, to intelligently advise Congress of changes necessary to be made in our existing tariff laws.

When the attention of the country was directed to the futility of this suggestion by recalling our experience with a tariff commission under the administration of President Arthur, when not a single recommendation made by it was observed, then we hear no more of a "permanent tariff commission" to advise Congress. But the suggestion of "a permanent tariff commission" involved the idea that some change in our tariff laws should be made, yet when it is shown that if revision is what is really wanted and that a tariff commission would result in nothing but delay, was in other words a mere subterfuge and a fraud, then we find the President undergoing still another change of mind. We find in his message that he says:

> Many of the largest corporations, many of those which should certainly be included in any proper scheme of regulation, would not be affected in the slightest degree by a change in the tariff, save as such change interfered with the general prosperity of the country.

I am satisfied he must have had in mind the steel trust, the consolidated or amalgamated steel companies. They would not be affected in the slightest degree in their profits by a revision of the tariff; of course not; and hence their complete indifference to this suggestion of tariff revision.

The President in his message says further:

> The only relation of the tariff to big corporations as a whole is that the tariff makes manufactures profitable, and the tariff remedy proposed would be in effect simply to make manufactures unprofitable.

I am quite sure he must have had in mind the steel trust again, or may be the agricultural implement trust, both of which, after paying ocean freight, undersell similar goods manufactured in free-trade England, and of course they are selling at a loss; it is the generous way of our Yankee trader!

Our President further states in his message that—

> To remove the tariff as a punitive measure directed against trusts would inevitably result in ruin to the weaker competitors who are struggling against them.

Now, I know he must have had in mind the steel trust, because it is well known to us all how many weak competitors are struggling against this giant monopoly, which at all times commands the best talent for its service not alone within its factories but elsewhere, even on the floor of this House.

The President makes the statement, which one would think was decisive of his attitude on this question, that—

> The question of regulation of the trusts stands apart from the question of tariff revision.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, anticipating that the people would demand relief from the cruel exactions of the coal trust, and knowing that when the pinch of cold was felt the people would not tolerate any equivocation, or temporizing with their just demands, the President in effect contradicts himself in his message by recommending that the tariff on anthracite coal should be removed.

He also said in this message, speaking of the revision of the tariff, that—

> There must never be any change which will jeopardize the standard of comfort, the standard of wage of the American wage-worker.

By this I take it he meant to convey the idea that a reduction of the coal tariff would reduce the wages of the coal laborers. Now, if the regulation of the coal trust stands apart from the question of the repeal of the tariff on coal, why does the President, when the crisis comes, when he knows that action must be taken, when the period arrives when the trust can not longer be served without outraging the people to such an extent that it would arouse their active resentment, why does he urge the removal of the duty, and why do you, the leaders of the Republican party on this floor, come with laggard steps, it is true, offering the same remedy?

> Oh, what a tangled web we weave
> When first we practice to deceive!

Mr. Speaker, what brought about the conditions which make this bill, which ought to permanently repeal the duty on anthracite coal, necessary? A few months ago the thousands of laborers who are engaged in mining anthracite coal requested an increase of wages, stating that the wage they were receiving was so scant that it did not enable them to give proper food and clothing to their wives and children. This request was denied, the same heartless instrumentality speaking for the coal trust then that now, in its efforts to recoup its losses, permits suffering on the part of the poor of this country.

As a result of this denial a strike was ordered—the only means offered organized labor to protect itself against the greed, the rapacity, and the brutality of consolidated wealth.

This strike continued for months, and notwithstanding the suffering it must have entailed on the families of the unfortunate coal miners, they conducted themselves with creditable forbearance. Finally, by stress of public opinion, the coal operators and railroads engaged in transporting coal, which together constitute the coal trust, were forced to accept propositions of arbitration, and coal mining was resumed.

Now, while the matters of dispute are still under consideration the coal trust attempts to recoup itself, and the price and supply of coal is such as to occasion intense suffering on the part of the people. What remedy do you, the membership of the dominant party, propose? The emergency is upon you. You must act. Notwithstanding your obligation to the trust, your disinclination to do anything inimical to their interests, you realize the people demand action. They insist that something be done by you to take them out of the clutches of this trust, which now sorely distresses them.

You offer to do what Democrats contend will in all such cases bring the consumers in this country relief. You offer the remedy of tariff revision. Yet from your standpoint you are pitiably inconsistent, and you know it.

What becomes of your stock argument that the tariff duty is a tax levied for the protection of American labor against the pauper labor of Europe? You have often sung the song, but now you are driven, looking at it from the orthodox Republican standpoint, to open the door to coal mined by pauper labor in England and Chinese labor in the Dominion of Canada, as was so plaintively described by the gentleman from Wyoming a moment ago, and that, too, when the unfortunate miner is most in need of this vaunted protection against the pauper labor referred to.

Either you were hypocritical when you resorted to this argument or you are cruel now to the coal miners, who need all the help they can get to recover from the distress occasioned by the long strike.

You are not cruel. Your hearts are gentle and kind. This condition only serves to expose the rank hypocrisy of the Republican party on this tariff issue.

It has never been claimed by even its strongest partisans that the Republican party is other than a party of expediency. Your actions to-day once again accentuates this fact, for you recognize a sentiment is growing in this country in favor of tariff revision as an effective means of destroying monopolies, especially monopolies controlling the necessities of life.

No cry of "stand pat" can check it. No specious plea for "a nonpartisan tariff commission" to be appointed by a partisan of the high-protective policy will be permitted to delay it. No promise of "a revision of the tariff by its friends" will be accepted. This sentiment is not of a day's growth. Long ago it manifested itself in the great agricultural State of Iowa, as I had occasion to state during the last session of Congress, when I quoted from the governor of that State to the effect that he opposed "any tariff which afforded a shelter for monopoly." It was on yesterday again echoed by the junior Senator from that State. In fact, it has gathered such force and momentum that it has swept from office another distinguished son of that State, the presiding officer of this august body.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, we have outgrown the fetich of protection, especially protection which fosters monopoly and permits our own people to be pillaged in order that a trust may undersell those engaged in the same line in foreign markets, and that, too, at a price lower than we are charged at home for the same product.

The people will not longer be led astray by false and specious arguments. They are at last beginning to realize that they have been made the victims of injustice and extortion. They desire a revision of our outrageously oppressive tariff laws. They will demand a return of those days when equal rights were accorded to all and special privileges granted to none. Then the consumers of this country will be no longer taxed for the benefit of trusts and monopolies.

When this demand is earnestly made by the people, then the Republican Party will certainly go out of power. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I hope that gentlemen on the other side will use some of their time. We have had four speeches on this side.

Mr. McCALL. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCALL. I should like to ask whether in the gentleman's opinion the rebate provided by this bill would apply to coal in bond at the time of the passage of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I think undoubtedly it would do so, because this rebate is a full rebate, a full discount on all coal coming into the United States; and the duty is not due until it is taken out of bond and enters into consumption. So that I have no doubt in answering the gentleman's question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. About how much coal is now in bond?

Mr. PAYNE. I will ask unanimous consent of the House to publish in the RECORD some tables on that subject. They have been prepared by the clerk of the committee, and are interesting. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I ask that such leave be extended so that all members may have leave to print remarks in the RECORD on this bill for five days.

Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] asks unanimous consent that all members may have leave for five days to print in the RECORD remarks on this question. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. I will put those figures in the RECORD. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON].

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Speaker, representing a large coal-producing State, I want to say that I am satisfied that every man in that State would gladly do anything and everything in his power to relieve the famine and the distress that has come to the country on account of the scarcity of coal. At the same time I do not believe, nor can I by any logical process reach the conclusion, that this measure will afford a particle of relief. If it was possible for coal that was selling before the strike at 80 cents at the mines to be brought in competition with foreign coal simply by the release of a 67-cent duty, no man can tell me that, under the present extraordinary conditions, coal selling at the mines and commanding a price of from $3 to $4 a ton will be affected by this duty.

It seems to me, sir, that if the House wants to accomplish a remedy it can be done in a more practical way, and I say, simply as a suggestion, that if you will suspend for sixty days the provision of the interstate-commerce law which prohibits railroad companies from discriminating in the carrying of freight the miners in the coal-producing States will bring this famine to an end by producing a sufficient amount of coal.

I know it to be true that to-day the mines in my section are not running more than half time, simply because the railroads can not possibly handle the coal that is offered to them. It is simply an impossibility for them, with the motive power and the cars at their command, to move in one month's time an amount of coal that requires under ordinary conditions six months' time. Allow the coal roads for a limited period to refuse or discriminate against all other freight and devote all, or nearly all, their cars and engines to the transportation of coal and I am sure, so far as soft coal at least is concerned, the famine will end. This they can not, as I understand, do under the requirements of the interstate-commerce law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAYNE. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES].

[Mr. GAINES of West Virginia addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has seventeen minutes remaining.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this measure, first, because I do not believe it will afford the relief desired and expected, for if foreign coals could be had in great enough quantity to break the present coal famine throughout the East, those coals would now be seeking and reaching our shores regardless of the 67 cents per ton tariff, in view of the fact that coal is selling all the way from $1 to $5 above its normal price.

I believe this legislation will utterly fail of its object. We are told that it is demanded by a strong public sentiment; that there is much popular clamor for it, largely brought about, in my opinion, by the extravagant statements of those Democratic doctrinaires who favor placing coal upon the free list; but its futility in relieving the situation and its efficacy before the expiration of the period for which it runs in depriving American miners of the opportunity of employment will be clearly demonstrated.

Foreign coals will not come to our Eastern ports under present conditions under this bill any more freely than they do now, but before a year shall have passed, during the summer season, when the demand is less, then foreign cargoes seeking markets will come into competition with our coal and will divide the trade, even though there be no reduction in price below the average or normal price at such season, and our mines will in that way be deprived of a considerable portion of their market.

It will not necessarily follow that the price of coal at the seaboard will be lowered by the abolition of the duty, provided foreign coals are relieved of the payment of the duty. Without a reduction in the normal or ordinary price of coal, our coal mines will lose a large portion of their trade and our miners a corresponding portion of their employment by the operation of the well-understood rule of trade that two articles of similar quality and character competing for the trade will, at an equal price, divide the market.

In the second place, I am opposed to the bill because it threatens to deprive the mines of my State of a large part of their market.

The coals of my State largely come in competition with coals which pay a less freight haul than we pay, mined by Chinamen in the mines of Canada, and; though there be no reduction in the present price of coal in the markets we supply, our coal will be largely displaced by foreign coals by the operation of the rule I have referred to. It is not necessary to reduce the price of coal in any market which the coals of Wyoming reach in order to deprive those coals of a large proportion of their market, providing, as under the provisions of this bill, you relieve the foreign shipper of the payment of duty.

Relieve him of 67 cents per ton of duty, and while he will not necessarily reduce the price of his coal, he will be able to meet the price our operators now make, and by so doing at least secure a large portion of our trade. A considerable portion of the five and one-half million tons of coal mined annually in my State now finds markets which will be sought under the provisions of this bill by coal mined in British Columbia and on Vancouver Island.

We have recently enacted a bill which keeps from our shores the Celestial, but by the passage of this act we open our seaports to his products. It will not reduce the price, and I wish the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] to understand me on this point, because he does not seem to have done so. It will not reduce the price, in my opinion, one penny to the purchaser in the markets that our coals now find, but by relieving the foreign coal of the payment of the 67 cents duty, it will allow them to come into our markets on more than even terms, and secure a very considerable portion of our trade.

I appreciate the fact that if the gentlemen on the other side were given the opportunity they would attempt to place coal on the free list, the result of which would be to absolutely wipe out a large portion of the industry in my State and in the adjoining States in the West.

The gentleman from Tennessee, the leader and spokesman of the minority, as well as all the gentlemen who have spoken on the Democratic side, has assured us that if his party were given the oportunity they would place coal permanently on the free list, and I thank God, as I desire the growth and development of my State and the prosperity of its people, that the time seems far distant when they shall have a majority in this House and an opportunity to destroy our industries.

They talk eloquently of their solicitation for the welfare of our people, but whenever an opportunity offers to strike at an industry giving employment to large numbers of people they never fail to do it.

My party has been dragooned into this futile and foolish application of a homeopathic dose of free trade because our Democratic friends, taking advantage of a temporary condition of real distress and coal shortage, have convinced a lot of unthinking people that the coal tariff is responsible for it. We know it is not, and we should stand by our convictions.

I sympathize with those poor people who are paying exorbitant prices for coal as much as any member of this House, but I am opposed to opening our splendid markets to foreigners in a futile attempt to relieve the situation at the expense of our own mine workers.

No people in the Union are more vitally interested in this legislation than those I represent.

When we seek a market at San Francisco or Puget Sound points we find there not only Japanese and English coals, brought over in ballast, but coals mined by Chinese labor on Vancouver Island, which reach our ports with a water freight which is but a fraction of the railway rates we pay to reach the same market.

In the States north and northwest of us, where we find large markets, we come in competition with coal mined at Gault, Lethbridge, and other points in British Columbia. These coals are also mined by Chinese labor of the lowest type. They have no greater, and in some cases a less, freight haul than our coals, so that we are at a disadvantage both in cost of mining and in freight rates.

The tariff alone makes it possible to hold our markets against Canadian coals.

We have thousands of square miles of coal territory in my State. Coal mining is one of our most promising industries. Under the Republican policy of protection the industry has prospered, and I deeply regret that our party in the House of Representatives has been stampeded into the advocacy, even as an emergency measure, of this un-Republican legislation.

My only consolation in the present situation I find in the fact that the Republican majority of the House stands firmly by the doctrine of a protective duty on coal, which assures me that after the expiration of this measure, if it become a law, and the passing of the popular error which demands it, we may be assured that there will be no further tinkering with the coal tariff; and I cherish the hope that the damage threatened the labor and the capital of my State by this legislation will be minimized by reason of the fact that, should it be enacted, it will only be in force a year, and will therefore hold out no inducement to our Canadian competitors to open new mines or largely increase their output.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. PAYNE. I would state that that has already been granted. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW].

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, the history of anthracite coal production for a number of years shows that the production during the winter months, and I mean by that the entire production in anthracite, is not equal to the consumption for those months. Heretofore there has been a surplus at the end of the summer months of from fifteen to twenty millions of tons. The trouble to-day is that if the anthracite coal mines since the strike produced to their full capacity and the miners worked every day, which they have not done, the production would not equal the consumption heretofore during the winter months.

That permits the dealers who have coal to ask what price they please. There is no combination between the producers of coal. The Reading Railroad imposes upon its agents the condition that they shall not sell their coal for more than about $7 a ton. But they do not and can not produce enough to meet the market. Now, there is the trouble. So there is no occasion for this declamation against men honorable in business that they combine to make money out of the distresses of women and children. The charge is too often made by men ignorant of the facts in business.

Mr. Speaker, that is all I desire to say, that the state of things results from existing facts, and it results because the miners last summer did not produce a ton of coal during the period when they would ordinarily have provided a surplus for this winter of from 15,000,000 to 16,000,000 tons of coal.

REBATE ON COAL.

Mr. PAYNE. I reserve the balance of my time, and ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] to exhaust his.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has eleven minutes remaining.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. How much has the other side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Ten minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has given the House his confirmed judgment that this measure will be productive of no good. In that state of the case it would seem to be incumbent upon him or somebody else entertaining the same view to give the House and the country a reason for its passage. Upon any theory that calls for its passage or for similar legislation it is incumbent upon those who control legislation in this body and in the one at the other end of the Capitol to say to the people of the United States why the legislation has been delayed, why six weeks have passed without any action. And later on perhaps it may be as pertinently inquired why are other weeks permitted to pass without any definite action.

But the question whether this measure, passed at this time, in this form, will or will not be productive of substantial good is not the real question that lies at the bottom of the whole contention. Suppose that such a measure as this, or, better still, one of a permanent nature, relating to the same subject, had been upon the statute book a year ago, had been upon the statute book when the coal famine began, when people were unable to lay in their ordinary supply of winter fuel. Who doubts that then fuel would have come in gradually from abroad to meet a growing necessity, and that the condition of things which now exists would have had no existence whatever in this country? It is not a question whether this legislation, so tardily and grudgingly brought forward, will be productive of much good, but the real question is whether or not such a law as would relieve this prime necessary of life from an onerous burden would or would not be productive of good to the general American public. With such a law upon the statute book, with the great necessaries of life relieved from burdens placed upon them for the benefit of a few selfish producers, who can doubt in the light of experience, both of the present and the past, that very much of good would come to the American people?

It is safe to predict that even with this law—limited and circumscribed in its terms as it is, and to last for but a single year—upon the statute book no such state of distress will arise or exist in this country next year as we have now. Because if there be next year, as there was last year, an extraordinary demand for fuel, with the source of supply cut off in this country, owing to causes that I have not time to discuss, or to any other cause, the lack will be supplied from abroad. Gentlemen need not fear that in the good year 1903 there will be the distress and anxiety on account of the scarcity of fuel in this country which the past year, 1902, witnessed. If there be a blockade, from whatever cause, if there be a denial to the people of a reasonable supply of this or other necessary articles at reasonable cost, and if the artificial barriers be removed, if the opportunity be given the people to supply themselves from abroad, there will be no danger, no ground of apprehension, that suffering will exist such as is broadspread to-day.

This legislation, or legislation on this subject, ought to have been enacted the very first day of the assembling of this Congress. Aye, if regard had been shown for the necessities of the American people, if any of the leaves of experience in this country's history in times of distress had been read, such legislation would have had a permanent place in the law long ago.

This legislation will serve in its small way as an object lesson; and because it will, because gentleman upon the other side realize that it will, they are so reluctant to furnish the material for the lesson.

But the lesson is taught, the lesson will be conned, the lesson will be learned; and I believe, in the light of bitter experience, of suffering in the pinching cold, in the horrors of zero weather without fuel, the American people will determine that it is not good for them to bar themselves from sources of supply which nature has given, which only the artificial laws of man interfere with or shut off; and that in their wisdom, learning out of bitter necessity the lesson which went unheeded in times of less stress, they will call upon you, gentlemen, call upon their legislators of whatever party, to give them an opportunity to get the things which they are bound to have if they would escape great suffering, and, in some instances, if they would preserve life itself—to give them an opportunity to get those things without paying exorbitant prices and without unnecessary and hurtful hindrance. Gentlemen can not push back the ocean that is pouring in upon them. They can not stay investigation and experience by talk. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey.

[Mr. McDERMOTT addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Has the other side exhausted their time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time on the other side is exhausted.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the policy of the Democratic party as represented upon this floor seems to be to oppose this measure by bitter denunciation, attacking the friends of the bill; by assailing their motives and purposes in bringing in the bill, and then hide behind an affirmative vote in favor of the bill, and thereby attempt to play politics in the hour of the country's trouble and peril.

I may say to the gentleman from New Jersey that, so far as my vote in favor of the report of this bill and in favor of the rule under which it is being considered, and the vote which I shall give in favor of the bill upon its passage, it is not a measure, and not intended by me to be, an invitation to any country to come here to destroy a great industry in the United States. This measure is a measure of expediency and emergency; and if it be true, as the gentleman says, that there will be no relief under it, at the end of a year the precedent conditions will of themselves go into operation, and there will be no further trouble about them, but if the gentleman wants to carry on a scheme intended to destroy the industries of this country—those that we already have—he will not find me, and I do not believe any considerable number of Republicans on this side of the House, with him in his enterprise. I am still a protectionist, and have unlimited faith in the triumph of our own people.

We can produce our own coal when conditions reestablish themselves. We have more coal in the United States than all the world, so far as discovered. Four-fifths of the coal of the United States lies in a virgin condition, and we have the labor and capital, the machinery and genius to furnish our markets at a fair price, and American business men in the long run, or in the shorter run, will settle all these questions.

The gentleman from Tennessee assaults the Republican party because we have any tariff on coal, and wants to know why we did not put the article perpetually on the free list. Well, I might answer the gentlemen by asking him how he came to vote for a tariff of 40 cents a ton, and that, too, on a short ton, apparently a not much lower tariff than the present tariff of 60 cents a ton. Why did he do that; why did the Democratic party in both branches of Congress in 1894 perpetrate such an outrage as that, if it is an outrage, by passing a 40-cent tariff on the short ton in the Wilson bill?

Something has been said by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] about suspending the operation of the interstate-commerce law. I join him in a benediction upon that subject. I was one of the 26 in this House that voted against the passage of the law originally, and I have no sort of doubt I did right.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the question is not too long.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I wanted to say that my colleague is only in favor of the suspension of the law. Neither he nor I are opposed to the interstate-commerce law. I, for my part, believe in that law, but believe that its operation ought to be so far suspended for a period of sixty or ninety days that prosecutions could not be had under it by roads diverting——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, I understand the gentleman.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, that enters the great coal fields of West Virginia, long ago issued an order which I have read, and which I presume the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] fully understands, to receive nowhere along their line any full car freight, excepting coal, and that great system of railroad is to-day carrying coal exclusive of all other freights in so far as carload lots are concerned. I do not believe in the interference with the Interstate Commerce Commission. It has done no good; it is a powerless Commission: a Commission without power and without efficacy, and has worked out precisely what its opponents charged it would when it was up before the House for final passage. It has stood in the way and blocked by inelastic rules the natural action of the great law of supply and demand in the traffic of the country. I would repeal the interstate-commerce law to-day and create a commission within the Department of Commerce, the bill which is pending here. I would create a power there that could give some efficacy in remedying these troubles, an aid to the President in his work in this direction.

Now, the Republicans in this House have brought this measure here as an experiment, and with a hope that good may come of it. I shall neither give an opinion that it is going to be worthless or that it is going to be effective. I hope for the best. It is enough to say that there seems to have been a demand from all over the country for everything to be done that could be done to bring about some relief of the pinch of this coal famine. It will not affect the price of soft coal by competition anywhere this side of the Missouri River, unless possibly in New England. It could not do that, except possibly the cheaper and poorer coal of Nova Scotia may crowd the market at a later day in the summer in those States.

But, Mr. Speaker, lest I forget it, I would like to admonish my friends of the East, and the authorities in the East, that there are some things besides grumbling about railroad combinations that they might do to remedy their condition. If I was going to make a suggestion that would do more to relieve the people of the Eastern States from the chances and dangers of a repetition of the coal famine, I should advise them to take off the statute book the laws which they have passed; take out the regulations by city ordinances of the cities, which discriminate against bituminous coal. That is where they got themselves into the trouble that they are laboring under now. They worked this indirectly to create a power in this monopoly in hard coal and the effect is now being realized.

Let the people understand once and for all that the building up of a monopoly does not always exist necessarily in the combination of railroads, but the arguments that are made to the people about the cleanliness and the healthfulness of hard coal, and the bad effects of soft coal, by which law after law and ordinance after ordinance have been launched against this commodity, has done more than all else to prevent the accumulation of a supply of coal during the summer of 1902. Get rid of all these discriminations and let the people burn that fuel which they see fit to burn, and do not be alarmed about a little uncleanliness as the result of the use of the commodity, and you will have a great deal more coal a year from now than you have at the present time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to argue the case of the coal railroads of Pennsylvania that deliver this coal in New York. An investigation has been started at each end of this Capitol to try to find out what is the real trouble, and premature opinions are unwise. I predict now—and I give the prediction for the benefit of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN]—I predict that it will be discovered that the combination that he attacks and charges with being criminal, and the combination whose members the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] says ought to be in the penitentiary, will be found to be the least important element in connection with this trouble.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The time allowed for debate on this bill has expired.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. On that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 260, nays 5, answered "present" 3, not voting 86; as follows:

For the vote:

Mr. PEARRE with Mr. LANHAM.

For the balance of the day:

Mr. BURK of Pennsylvania with Mr. MAHONEY.

Mr. BARTHOLDT with Mr. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. SHERMAN with Mr. TALBERT.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I would vote "aye" if he were present.

The SPEAKER. That statement is not in order.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I would like to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening for his name?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I do not think I can state that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not vote, under the rule.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know if the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. DOVENER, has voted?

The SPEAKER. He has not voted.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am paired with the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called Mr. BROUSSARD'S name and he answered "present."

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from California, Mr. LOUD. He is not present and I wish to withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. Call the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk called Mr. GRIGGS's name and he voted "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 16567) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill, with Mr. BOUTELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

For contingent expenses at the headquarters of the several military departments, including the staff corps serving thereat, being for the purchase of the necessary articles of office, toilet, and desk furniture, binding, maps, books of reference, professional newspapers and periodicals, and police utensils, to be allotted by the Secretary of War, and to be expended in the discretion of the several military department commanders, $7,500.

For contingent expenses of the military information division, Adjutant-General's Office, including the purchase of law books, books of reference, periodicals and newspapers, and of the military attachés at the United States embassies and legations abroad, and of the branch office of the military information division at Manila, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $10,000: Provided, That section 3682, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to the expenditure of this appropriation so far as it relates to the offices of the military attachés abroad and to said branch office at Manila: And provided further, That section 3648, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to subscriptions for newspapers and periodicals to be paid for from this appropriation.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] what is the meaning of the proviso that section 3648, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to subscriptions for newspapers and periodicals to be paid for from this appropriation, so far as it relates to the officers of military attachés, etc., at Manila? I ask the question in good faith.

Mr. HULL. It is to provide for little purchases of periodicals and matters for the department headquarters that have to be paid for in advance and come here and be approved. I will get the section in a minute. I will state to the gentleman that the department has requested a still further proviso, which I will submit in a few moments. The section provides that "no moneys appropriated for contingent, incidental, or miscellaneous purposes shall be expended or paid for official or clerical compensation." This allows them to pay their clerks there, as I understand it. By reference to page 132, Book of Estimates, there will be found the following:

It is desired that section 3682, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to the expenditure of this appropriation, in order that the military attachés and the officer in charge of the branch office at Manila may be enabled to employ natives to temporarily perform clerical services, as they can be obtained at very low rates of compensation.

Foreign book dealers and publishers as a rule refuse subscriptions to newspapers and periodicals without payment in advance, as they do not understand our methods; and it is desired that section 3648, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to these subscriptions, in order that the officer making them will not have to advance private funds and wait until the expiration of the terms of subscription for reimbursement, or have his accounts disallowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department.

Mr. CANNON. This does not change the law except for the year, then?

Mr. HULL. That is all.

Mr. CANNON. I very much doubt the wisdom, I will say to the gentleman, of suspending these two sections of the Revised Statutes. If they are necessary here in the United States, where we are under the white light of public criticism, and it was found to be necessary to enact this legislation into permanent law which stood at the codification of the Revised Statutes away back a generation ago and still stands, much more is it necessary that there should not be a division or bureau—and I do not say that there will be—put at the discretion alone of whoever may be in command there, and this general appropriation available for their payment.

Mr. HULL. I would say to the gentleman that it does not increase the appropriation. They must administer it with proper economy, or they will run out of funds entirely. The appropriation is just the same, and according to the statement of the Adjutant-General it will be a matter of economy to permit them to hire these parties; and it is a matter of almost absolute necessity at Manila to allow them to purchase these newspapers and periodicals without advancing the money out of their own pockets.

Mr. CANNON. I want to call my friend's attention later on to the fact, if I understand it, that all this detail in the Army bill is largely deceptive; that there is a provision here that puts it all into one sum, I think, and that while they are seemingly specific——

Mr. HULL. That is for the pay of the Army only. That is my recollection.

Mr. CANNON. It does not apply then, to this?

Mr. HULL. It does not apply to these parts at all. I think if you will look you will see that it is for the pay of the Army—that is, all that the Paymaster-General disburses. I have not looked at it recently, but that is my understanding, that it is only what the Paymaster-General disburses. He has nothing to do with this.

Mr. CANNON. I will submit to the gentleman if he does not think it wise, if these sections of the statutes are suspended, that reports be made.

Mr. HULL. I assume that reports are made to the Secretary of War of the disbursement of every dollar of this fund.

Mr. CAPRON. That must be done under the general provision in the law.

Mr. CANNON. It may be made to the Secretary of War, but I do not know how much Congress may know of it.

Mr. HULL. I would say to the gentleman from Illinois that I would not raise any objection to an amendment, if he desires to offer it, providing that all such expenditures at Manila or by military attachés abroad shall be reported to Congress. If he will propose such an amendment as that I shall have no objection whatever to it. These sums are very small, as a rule, and I doubt if Congress would ever look at them.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me that it is safer to have it done.

Mr. HULL. Suppose we pass this over without prejudice, and let my friend prepare the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. No; I want my friend to do that.

Mr. HULL. I do not like to prepare amendments.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose you pass it over for the present, then.

Mr. HULL. I have no objection to passing it over for the present. The Clerk can read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER.

Signal Service of the Army: For expenses of the Signal Service of the Army as follows: Purchase, equipment, and repair of field electric telegraphs, signal equipments and stores, binocular glasses, telescopes, heliostats, and other necessary instruments, including necessary meteorological instruments for use on target ranges; war balloons; telephone apparatus (exclusive of exchange service) and maintenance of the same; electrical installations and maintenance at military posts; maintenance and repair of military telegraph lines and cables, including salaries of civilian employees, supplies, and general repairs, and other expenses connected with the duty of collecting and transmitting information for the Army, by telegraph or otherwise, $160,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. HULL] at what place he thinks it would be proper for me to offer the amendment I suggested to the gentleman?

Mr. HULL. I would suggest that he offer it when we come to pay the Signal Service. That deals with the officers.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase, installation, operation, and maintenance of a submarine cable for connecting the headquarters Department of the Columbia with military garrisons in southeastern Alaska, said cable to extend from a point at or near Fort Lawton, Seattle, Wash., via Sitka, Alaska, to Juneau, Alaska, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, $485,000.

Mr. CANNON. I want for the present, until I can ask about this, to reserve a point of order on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. I must confess that I am not familiar with the service now from the headquarters of the Department of the Columbia to Alaska. This seems to be for the purchase, installation, operation, and maintenance of this line. I may withdraw the point of order when I understand about it. I suppose private parties own this line now. Why should we buy it?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that the only line we have to connect with our military telegraph in Alaska is by way of the Dominion of Canada, and the Chief Signal Officer sent to the committee a very full statement as to the reasons why this should be done. It was considered somewhat confidential, and the clerk did not bring it in. In other words, we have a large extension of lines in Alaska which it was necessary for the Government to take up or else have our men isolated and the Government unable to communicate with them during a large part of the year. We are now dependent upon another government entirely to reach those lines. It is proposed to build a line between the Department of the Columbia and our military lines in Alaska, and have the connections made entirely under the control of the American Government. That, in brief, is the reason for it.

Mr. CANNON. I call my friend's attention to the fact that this is not for construction, but for the purchase, installation, operation, and maintenance, and so on.

Mr. HULL. It is for the purchase of wire; it is not for the purchase of a line now built.

Mr. CANNON. Is not there a line already opened, in whole or part?

Mr. HULL. Not making this connection. There is a line connecting all our posts in Alaska, for which we had an appropriation in this bill three years ago and continued it, but it is not a line that connects the Department of Columbia with Alaska in any way whatever.

Mr. CANNON. Is there a submarine cable that we propose to buy in whole or part?

Mr. HULL. My understanding, it is not. I will give you the information outside of a letter of the Secretary.

Mr. CANNON. I do not desire to embarrass anybody.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman can read it, or anybody else. The map shows the part proposed to be built. It is intended simply to connect this Government over its own lines.

Mr. CANNON. Where is the headquarters of the Department of Columbia? Is that on the map?

Mr. HULL. I understand the Department of California is San Francisco, and then the Department of Columbia includes the States of Oregon and Washington, and I think is at Vancouver.

Mr. PARKER. The hearings on page 23 cover this.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman that this is a matter of legislation, and in the absence of real necessity ought not to come up on a bill of this kind. I will suggest to the gentleman that he let it pass over until the bill is completed, and in the meantime examine it himself, because I am quite sure that my friend would not desire to purchase a submarine line.

Mr. HULL. We are not purchasing it.

Mr. PARKER. We buy the cable and lay it ourselves.

Mr. HULL. It will be laid by the Government of the United States. It will be constructed exactly as the line was constructed by the Signal Corps of the Army and used by the Government for its business, and I presume be opened for business outside.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. I could not catch what the gentleman has been saying. I understand the gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order. Do I understand that this will be an entirely new project, not work that we had already undertaken and is being continued?

Mr. HULL. It is a continuation, practically, of the Alaskan telegraph system.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now owned by the Government?

Mr. HULL. Now owned and operated by the Government. Over 1,100 miles in Alaska have been built by the Signal Corps upon appropriations made in the Army bill three years ago. I will read this much of the letter:

> Without the present telegraph system of Canada, and until a cable is laid to Alaska from some point in the United States, the extensive Alaskan system of the Signal Corps, consisting of 1,121 miles, connecting military posts, is strategically left in the air.

Thus we have built nearly 1,200 miles of telegraph lines in Alaska and are now dependent on another government to allow us connection. I think, and very properly in my judgment, the Department thinks that it is an addition that we ought to at once build through our own territory and connect with our own line and our own country.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand the gentleman to say that there are 1,100 miles in Alaska?

Mr. HULL. Over 1,100 miles.

Mr. BARTLETT. Owned by the Government?

Mr. HULL. Owned by the Government.

Mr. CAPRON. Built by the Signal Corps.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to letting this pass over, so that parties may examine it, without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the point of order is reserved and the section is passed over. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> For extra pay to expert riflemen, $12,000: Provided, That expert riflemen, hereafter qualifying as such, shall receive $1 a month in addition to their pay.

Mr. CANNON. I just reserve the point of order. This changes the law, as I understand. What is the necessity for it? What is to be its cost? Why should we pay expert riflemen; if so, why not all other experts?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I will in answer say that the Navy Department does give their expert riflemen additional pay. There is a feeling all over the United States in the National Guard and in the Regular Army to encourage in every way possible those in the service to become expert shots.

This is new legislation subject, to point of order. The committee realize that, but believe it is in line of good administration, and it can not cost a very large amount of money. Twelve thousand dollars is appropriated here, and by the having an additional dollar, of course, afterwards it will increase, but it can not amount to a very large sum of money, and will largely increase the efficiency of the Army, in my judgment. I think the committee was unanimously in favor of the provision, and I think the people of the country are unanimously in favor of it, so far as we have heard from military organizations. It gives the expert riflemen of the Army the same pay that it gives the expert shots in the Navy.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. What determines the expert?

Mr. HULL. The board that examines the record of marksmanship contests.

Mr. CANNON. What is the pay now?

Mr. HULL. He is a private soldier. They start in at $13 a month and get extra pay for each year's service up to $18 a month.

Mr. CANNON. Glancing through this bill, Mr. Chairman, it is considerably a legislative bill in this and many other provisions.

Mr. HULL. About the same as usual, including those reported by my friend from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. I do not think so. On the contrary, I will say to my friend, in the kindliest manner in the way of observation, that it is much easier to legislate by a provision like this, and touching the cable, and quite a number of other matters in this bill—it is much easier to legislate in connection with a general appropriation bill than it is to report and have each item considered on its merits. And in the general nature of things we tend constantly to increased legislation in connection with appropriations, I think to a greater extent touching naval affairs in the naval bill.

Mr. HULL. They report no other bill, and so they do all of their legislation upon that.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; but it seems to me that the tendency grows with the Military Committee, and I say it without any criticism, for it is in the nature of things. I do not think I would be justified in making the point of order if the committee was unanimous. I have no knowledge about expert riflemen; whether it is to end in an increase all along the line I do not know. Perhaps it ought to; I am not here to say.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman from Illinois wishes, I will have read what the Secretary of War said on the subject.

Mr. CANNON. I would sooner have the opinion of my friend here and of his committee, with all due respect.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit me, I will say a word about this matter. We already have a provision by general law for $2 a month extra pay for marksmanship to coast artillerymen. This law is thoroughly stated by Secretary Root in a letter which is annexed to the report of the Military Committee. The committee has been utterly frank in the statement that this is new legislation, and has stated the reason for it. It is by special request of the Secretary of War.

When we remember that about every 200 shots go astray in every battle to one that hits, one expert who can hit every time is worth 200 men. To be able to shoot is the important thing in the Army. In the Navy all sorts of rewards are offered for expert shooting. They do not appear upon the naval bill for the simple reason that in the naval appropriation bill it has always been recognized that the President was the commander in chief of the Navy, as he is said by the Constitution to be the commander in chief of the Army, and all that the naval bill does is to appropriate a gross sum of money for the pay of the Navy, while the President by regulation can change from time to time, and fixes the amount that shall be paid to the various sailors for long service and for good service. The pay of the gunners and master's mates and all the various grades in the Navy are fixed from time to time according to the exigency of the service, and thereby they obtain expert shots by paying them for it.

It is possible that we should have a better Army if organized in the same way, but we only pay by strict military law. We pay the private so much pay, as fixed by statute, with a rise for his length in service; we pay the corporal so much, and the sergeant so much, and not a dollar more can we pay him although he is as valuable as 20 men. When we want to pay a little more to a man who, in time of war will be worth 20 other men, and want to encourage expert efficiency with the rifle by an increase of pay, we have to come to Congress, and because a special bill would have little chance of being heard, we have to come by way of the general appropriation bill. We only ask to do what was done by special bill for the coast artillery, and is done without a bill all through the naval administration. I do hope the gentleman from Illinois will not only withdraw his objection, but say that he thinks it is a change that ought to be made for the good of the Army.

Mr. HEPBURN. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will not insist upon this point of order, for two reasons: First, because I think this is a most meritorious piece of legislation; and second, because I do not want the habit of objection to become chronic with my friend from Illinois. I have an amendment that I want to offer very soon, and I know it is subject to a point of order, and therefore I do not want this habit of objection confirmed so as to reach my case. [Laughter].

Mr. Chairman, I think a great deal may be said in favor of the proposition; this provision is one of the most important in this bill; and I should like it better if, instead of making provision for additional pay at the rate of $1 a month, it provided for five times that much.

In the Army we used to spend days and weeks and months in drilling the troops. The regiment of which I was once a member spent, I know, months of its time in attempting to perfect the soldiers in mere matters of evolution; and we became so expert after a while that we could perform with reasonable accuracy every evolution known to cavalry tactics. And yet, so far as practical use is concerned, we never used a half dozen different movements in all the real service that we performed. A half dozen movements will cover all that any regiment of infantry performed during any war that we have had on this continent. Yet we spent months in drill of that kind, and very little time in target practice. My regiment never expended a cartridge of the Government in target practice authorized by the authorities. It has been shown that in the engagements of the Mexican war our army expended 70 cartridges in order to produce a result.

At the battle of Murfreesboro the Federal troops expended 119 cartridges to kill or wound a man. Yet as an illustration of the contrary experience we have a case where a perfectly drilled army—that is, an army drilled in target practice—was engaged in the battle of New Orleans, and 2,600 men engaged in that battle in resisting the attack of Pakenham's forces killed or wounded nearly 2,600 men. The first rank fired but three times; the second rank but twice. Every two and one-half shots produced a result. Those men were marksmen; they were drilled; they were men who could shoot the eye of a squirrel when he was in the top of a tree. They had learned their business. I think we can develop the efficiency of our troops by bringing into prominence this matter of target practice, striving to secure emulation among the men so that they will be what a great majority of men might be with practice.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, in the presence of a unanimous Committee on Military Affairs, who believe this legislation ought to be had, and in view of the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], who heartily agrees with the committee, and who has had some practical knowledge about this matter, I will say that while the provision is clearly subject to a point of order, I think it behooves me, as I have but very little practical knowledge in the premises, not to insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being withdrawn, the Clerk will resume the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Engineer battalion, $262,116.

Mr. HULL. In that paragraph there is a typographical error. The word "battalion" should be "battalions." I ask that the "s" be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction indicated by the gentleman will be made by the Clerk.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Additional pay for length of service, $13,080.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the provision which I send to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, There shall be added to the Signal Corps of the Army, as now authorized by law, 1 colonel, 2 lieutenant-colonels, 4 majors, 8 captains, 8 first lieutenants: Provided further, That the vacancies thus created or caused shall be filled, first by the promotion of officers of the Signal Corps, according to seniority, and thereafter by detail from the line of the Army in accordance with existing law.

Mr. HAY. I rise to make a point of order against this amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. I hope the gentleman will not make the point of order.

Mr. HAY. Well, I reserve the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order will be reserved.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed that this amendment does not add any commissioned officers to the Army. The vacancies which will exist, should this provision become a law, will be filled, first, by promotion from the Signal Corps, and, secondly, by detail from the line. The only additional expense will be the greater compensation of one colonel, two lieutenant-colonels, and four majors, as compared with the compensation of a corresponding number of captains.

Now, there is a necessity for this increase. It grows out of the disproportion that now exists in this corps between the officers of the grade of field officers and those of the grade of line officers. In the Adjutant-General's corps all of the officers are above the grade of captain. The same is true in the Inspector-General's Office and in the Judge-Advocate-General's Office. In the Quartermaster's Department the percentage of field officers to total strength is 36.8; in the Subsistence Department, 37.2; in the Medical Department, 25; in the Pay Department, 51.9; in the Corps of Engineers, 30.8; in the Ordnance Department, 30.1; in the Signal Corps, 18.3.

If this addition should be made, the proportion of field to other officers would still be less in this corps than in any other. The present deficit places them at a disadvantage in all of the departments where the corps is represented on the general staff, and it ought not to be for that reason. Besides, there is a constant demand for the service of these officers, a constantly growing demand. This is becoming the scientific corps of the Army. Not only that, but with the new armament that we have, with the difficulty and impossibility of the use of cavalry, these officers are becoming the eyes of the Army. They are the means of information, they are the means of carrying and disseminating information, and this corps is rapidly becoming one of the most important in the Army. Therefore, as there is no opportunity of getting this in any other way, and as it is asked for and approved, as I am told, by the Secretary of War—certainly by the Chief Signal Officer—and as it is approved by the chairman of the committee and by other members of the committee with whom I have conferred, I do hope that my friend will not insist upon his objection and will allow us to have a vote on the matter.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I want to say but one word or two. I understand the gentleman from Virginia reserves his point of order. The House, when it passed the reorganization bill, gave the Signal Corps almost what is proposed by this amendment, though not quite. The Senate reduced it to the point at which it stands in the law now. I want to say that a few days ago, when I learned that my colleague proposed to offer an amendment increasing the Signal Corps, I called on the Secretary of War and talked with him in regard to the matter, and while I did not know the number which was proposed, and that was not definitely talked over, he stated that he had become convinced that there should be an increase in the officers assigned to the Signal Corps. It is a matter that the committee has not investigated, except as it investigated it under the old reorganization act. That gave, I think, two lieutenant-colonels, as proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] at this time. It gave an increase of majors, as proposed now, but I think not quite so many. I do not recall just what it was.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman will permit me, my recollection is that the only difference is that here there is a provision for an additional colonel.

Mr. HULL. With the same number of majors?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think that is so.

Mr. HULL. Be that as it may, I have no doubt in my mind but that the work the Signal Corps is performing, the amount of duties that devolve upon it, and the large scope of country they are serving in all cry out for an increase in this corps. I know that one gentleman with whom I am acquainted has been in the Philippine Islands and Cuba constantly since our Army landed in Cuba. The reason is that he could not be returned home because there were no officers to take his place.

Mr. HAY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is it not a fact that General Greely, the general of the Signal Corps, was before the Committee on Military Affairs and did not ask for any increase?

Mr. HULL. Yes; that is my recollection, but he was not interrogated.

Mr. HAY. Well, my experience is that one does not have to interrogate these gentlemen in order for them to ask for something.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman will refer to General Greely's report, he will find that substantially this amendment is asked for.

Mr. HULL. And I think, if the gentleman will remember, General Greely, when the question of the number of Signal Corps was before the committee, was very urgent that we should not agree to the Senate amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. I hope the gentleman will let us have a vote upon it.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to appear in the rôle of interfering in a matter of this sort, but the Committee on Military Affairs had General Greely before it and he never asked for anything of the sort. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] says that it does not increase the officers in the Army. I do not so understand his amendment. It does increase the officers in the Army, and the Army is already topheavy with officers.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit me to read a portion of the amendment which he undoubtedly did not hear?

Provided further, That the vacancies thus created or caused shall be filled, first by promotion of officers of the Signal Corps according to seniority and thereafter by details from the line of the Army, in accordance with existing law.

Mr. HAY. To what vacancies does the gentleman refer?

Mr. HEPBURN. As these men are pushed up there will be vacancies below, first lieutenants, that will be detailed from the Army.

Mr. HAY. Of course, but the first——

Mr. HEPBURN. I want to call the gentleman's attention, if he will allow me, to the fact that there is scarcely a possibility of the promotion of these gentlemen who are now captains and lieutenants in the Signal Corps. One gentleman who stands, I think, ninth or tenth, will not be promoted in the ordinary course of matters until 1926. He will have had to serve as a captain twenty-eight years before he is promoted. I submit that that is not fair, that that is not the incentive that ought to be held out to men, and I hope that the gentleman will allow this amendment.

Mr. HAY. I want to know where the officers are to come from who are to be added to the Signal Corps at once by the amendment of the gentleman.

Mr. HEPBURN. There are three officers to a company, say, of infantry. There will be some vacancies. They are not vacancies to be filled by appointment, but vacancies in the immediate discharge of duties there. There will be details, as details are now made.

Mr. HAY. You provide for the immediate appointment of colonels, majors, and captains to the Signal Corps. Where are they coming from, unless they are appointed?

Mr. HEPBURN. They will come from the line, as this provides.

Mr. HAY. Very well. Who takes the places of these officers of the line?

Mr. HEPBURN. Their places will not be filled.

Mr. HAY. It just shows that we can not consider sensibly in the Committee of the Whole an amendment of that sort, and therefore I must insist——

Mr. STEELE. I hope the gentleman will allow me to say one word.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. STEELE. If you will allow the adding of the words—

Provided, That this shall not increase the number of officers in the Army,

It will certainly not do so. There are a great many officers serving at these large posts who can be spared for temporary details. Therefore, in order to increase the number of officers in the Signal Corps you would only decrease the number in the line.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield——

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. HULL. Oh, yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not a fact that the net result of the amendment if adopted will be to increase the number of commissioned officers in the Army?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, under the general law, when an officer is detailed, his place in the line is filled from the lower grades. Others are promoted, and it increases the number of second lieutenants.

Mr. HEPBURN. If there is any doubt about this, I am willing to modify the amendment so as to make it certain.

Mr. HAY. I will withdraw the point of order if the gentleman from Iowa will add to the provision that there shall be no increase in the officers, either of the line or staff of the Army.

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman does that he ought to strike out the part referring to the detail as now provided by law.

Mr. HEPBURN. No; I think not.

Mr. HULL. Just strike out the words "as now provided by law" and fill by detail only, for the reason that the law now provides that when an officer is detailed to the staff, the officers of the line are promoted up, and a new officer is put in, until the same number of men are serving as before. As they come back and forth after they are once detailed, the number of second lieutenants is not decreased, and, as things are now, there must, in the nature of things, be some increase whenever an officer of the line is detailed to the staff corps.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words in the amendment offered by me, "in accordance with existing law," and add, "Provided further, That no addition to the number of officers in the Army shall be created by the foregoing provision."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the modification will be made.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent of the House that the amendment just adopted may be inserted after line 23, on page 12; and I do that for the reason, at the place inserted here (I did not want to raise that question at the time when the amendment was offered), we are legislating for the enlisted corps of the Army, while on page 12 we are legislating for the officers of the Signal Corps of the Army.

Mr. HEPBURN. I certainly have no objection to that on my part.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment will be inserted as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, after line 23, page 12.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

RETIRED OFFICERS.

For pay of officers on the retired list and for officers who may be placed thereon during the current year, $1,000,700.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, there is an error of the printer there or an error in making up the bill. That should be $700,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Clerk will make the correction.

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa how many retired officers have we?

Mr. HULL. I have not counted them up lately. This appropriation is simply for those who are there, who are on the retired list by law, and all that we do when the Department furnishes the estimate for the amount, is to appropriate the amount.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman inform me how many were on the retired list when he was last informed?

Mr. HULL. I have not kept track of the retired list, but assume them to be there, and when the Department says that this is the number, we cut the amount some thousand dollars, with the idea that some will die. Of course there is no certainty that they will, and there may be a deficiency in this item.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of forty-two veterinarians, at $1,500, $63,000,

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa, or my colleague on my left, if we had 42 veterinarians during the recent war. In other words, has the number been diminished now that we have peace?

Mr. HULL. This is the number provided for in the reorganization bill, and all of them are employed. They have two with each regiment of cavalry and a certain number with the artillery, and it is the number provided for by existing law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, does it require as many veterinarians now when our Army is about 59,000, when we have peace, as it did when it was 100,000 and in active operation?

Mr. HULL. We have not reduced the number of regiments of cavalry or batteries of artillery.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. As you reduce the number of cavalry you would reduce the number of horses, would you not?

Mr. HULL. We do not reduce the number of regiments, companies, or posts.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses of courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and compensation of reporters and witnesses attending the same, $20,000.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, there is another amendment, left out by inadvertence, that is in the law heretofore and should be now. Insert after the word "inquiry," line 20, the words "military commissions;" so that it will read: "For expenses of courts-martial, courts of inquiry, military commissions, etc."

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 20, page 14, after "inquiry," insert "military commissions."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional pay to officer in charge of public buildings and grounds at Washington, D. C., $1,000.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire what rank this officer held?

Mr. HULL. I think he is a captain in the Regular Army.

Mr. LITTLE. My understanding has always been when they go to fight they were given more pay than when they were put to civilian employment.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman does not understand this question at all.

Mr. LITTLE. That is the reason why I ask for information.

Mr. HULL. For the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds it was provided by a law passed a great many years ago that while so serving he should have the rank and pay of a colonel.

Mr. LITTLE. That is the existing law?

Mr. HULL. That is the existing law, and has been for a great many years. This simply covers the difference in pay between the real rank and the rank of colonel; and if he were a major it would not require this amount.

Mr. LITTLE. I simply wanted an explanation, for information.

Mr. HULL. Since I have been in Congress there has only been one bill passed where there was no provision of this kind, and that was while Colonel Wilson, of the Engineer Corps, was Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, and while so serving he became a colonel and this was left out.

Mr. LITTLE. This has been the current bill?

Mr. HULL. Certainly. It is the law.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

PHILIPPINE SCOUTS.

Fifty first lieutenants, $80,000.
Fifty second lieutenants $75,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Iowa please tell us if these Philippine scouts cooperate with our army in the Philippine Islands, or what connection they have with our Army? Are they a part of the army sent from the United States, or are these scouts natives?

Mr. HULL. The enlisted force are natives, but the officers are not. The law provides that all the field officers shall come from the Regular Army by assignment, the captains from the Regular Army, but the first and second lieutenants may come from the Regular Army or from civil life.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many scouts are there?

Mr. HULL. About 5,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How large is the army that it is intended to keep in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. HULL. All I know about that is what the gentleman himself knows.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is about 23,000, says Mr. Secretary Root in his last report, if I remember correctly.

Mr. HULL. I think they are going to reduce it below that. I will say to the gentleman, however, that that is a question which may be agreed upon to-day and changed to-morrow. It is at the discretion of the President at all times.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much does it cost to maintain a soldier in the Philippine Islands, and how much in the United States?

Mr. HULL. That is a question that I have not figured out. With the scouts it would cost less than in this country. With the soldiers it is more, because we pay them 20 per cent more than if they served in this country. So it would cost 20 per cent more, besides the freight for taking his supplies over there from this country.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why I asked the question, Mr. Chairman, is because the last information I had was from General Breckinridge's report of last year. He stated that it cost $1,285 a year for every soldier to maintain and equip him, exclusive of armament. I was informed a few days ago by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] that there was an increased amount paid the soldier in the Philippine Islands, making the cost per soldier with equipment about $1,500 a year. I wanted to get at the exact facts if I can.

Mr. HULL. The only way the gentleman can do that is to call upon the War Department and have their best mathematicians figure it out.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

Hereafter, in all payments to be made under the provisions of Army appropriation acts, when the rate of compensation is annual payment, shall be made monthly at the rate of one-twelfth of the annual rate, and of such monthly rate and of all other monthly rates of compensation one-thirtieth shall be the daily rate for computation of pay for fractional parts of a month; and for the purposes of this act each and every month shall be held to consist of thirty days, whether the actual number of days be greater or less.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the point of order on that paragraph, I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa wherein it changes existing law.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, the Army pay tables for almost fifty years have been in exact compliance with this provision in the bill. It has passed the Treasury during all these years without a question being raised. It is entirely satisfactory to the Army, both the officers and the men, but the present Comptroller of the Treasury holds that, in the absence of law specifically stated, this method of computation can not be allowed; that they must change the method of payment and pay only for the actual days, regardless of thirty days in the month.

In other words, for February they could only pay for twenty-eight days and for March they must pay for thirty-one days. It changes the entire computation tables of the War Department. It make a difference in the method of paying the Army which has prevailed for more than fifty years and simply enacts into law a measure that will enable them to pay as they have all of these past years.

Mr. CANNON. The difference being that without this proposed legislation they get paid for three hundred and sixty-five days a year. With this the pay is for three hundred and sixty days for the year, and then the five days are paid besides.

Mr. HULL. My understanding of this is that they are paid so much a month of thirty days. The year is divided into twelve equal parts. If a man serves a year he gets exactly the same pay as he would by the other method.

Mr. CANNON. How are the men in the Navy paid and the people in civil life?

Mr. HULL. I understand the commercial law is largely like this provision of thirty days to the month. We pay so much a month where you pay a yearly salary. It is one-twelfth of the salary every month, same as is the case with members of Congress.

Mr. CANNON. This legislation, as I understand, is in harmony with the practice of the Government for a half century.

Mr. HULL. Yes; it is exactly in harmony with the way members of Congress are paid. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the comma in line 1, page 17, after the word "payment," and insert it after the word "annual."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to amend, and the Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the comma after the word "payment" and insert it after the word "annual."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 37 of the act of February 2, 1901, entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States," is hereby repealed, and the Secretary of War is directed to muster out the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry of the United States service on or before July 1, 1903: Provided, That the officers and enlisted men of the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry shall, upon being mustered out, be paid two months' extra pay, to be paid out of the appropriation for pay of the Army: Provided further, That officers of the Regular Army serving with the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry when mustered out of said regiment shall return to their lineal rank in the Regular Army and shall be paid for service with said regiment only for time actually in such service.

Mr. COWHERD. I want to reserve a point of order on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] reserves a point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. HULL. I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri——

Mr. COWHERD. Permit me to say that I reserve this point simply because I want to get some information.

Mr. HULL. The law creating this regiment provided that it should be retained in service until such time as Congress might take further action. It was not regarded as a permanent part of the military establishment. We have now reached the time when all authorities seem to agree that this regiment is no longer needed. It is maintained at the expense of the Government, but has absolutely nothing to do.

The coast defense or batteries there furnish a certain number of artillery; but the evidence before the committee, as submitted by the Secretary of War, was to the effect that without any United States soldiers peace could be maintained, good order preserved, and property and lives be protected by the civil authorities of Porto Rico alone. Therefore the committee struck out the appropriation for this regiment and inserted this provision, so that we might not have the anomaly of continuing this organization without providing for its pay.

Mr. COWHERD. Then, if I understand the gentleman, this will simply reduce the appropriation by that much, and reduce the Army to a corresponding extent.

Mr. HULL. It reduces the Army by this much, and reduces correspondingly the appropriation.

Mr. COWHERD. I should like to have read at the desk a paper which has been submitted to me upon this proposition. It is quite short.

The CHAIRMAN. The paper sent to the desk by the gentleman from Missouri will be read, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Troops must always be kept in the island, and the Porto Rico regiment is by far the cheapest and most desirable. It can be sustained far more cheaply than a regiment of Americans, because the men do not draw "foreign-service pay."

It is composed of Porto Ricans of the middle class, the most loyal of all to the United States Government. It is efficient—highly so—as every inspector has said for three years. The men are proud of the service, of the uniform, and the regiment.

They believe themselves to be a part of the Government, paid by it, and entrusted with the protection of the homes of their kindred against internal danger or possible foreign invasion. There has been more real, honest, loyalty bred in Porto Rico by the influence of the soldiers of the regiment than by all other causes combined. The people look upon the regiment as their own, and are loyal to the Government which garrisons their towns with their own sons instead of sending down regiments of another race.

The men are being given systematic daily instruction in the English language, and through them the knowledge and influence of the tongue is being spread over the island. They are being trained to fit them for duties of importance in their communities when they shall retire from the service. They are acquiring executive ability, "of which there is a woeful lack among the people," and will be able to render valuable service in civil life in positions requiring knowledge of the control of men and the best method of carrying on public work.

As a strong binding link between the common people of Porto Rico and the Government of the United States and as a public educator, the regiment is worth twice its cost. With a population in Porto Rico of 1,000,000 people, of mixed races upon a small tropical island, considerably more than one-half illiterate, ignorant, and barely self-sustaining, the actually vicious and dangerous element is naturally very large.

The excitable and revengeful disposition of the mixed Latin races makes it almost certain that under unusual excitement, or when large numbers of people are unemployed and ill fed, riots and dangerous disturbances are bound to occur. The American property interests are large and constantly growing, and are of the very kind that would suffer most severely in case of riots.

The insular police force, as it is now organized and must continue to remain, can not be depended on to cope with even a moderate emergency. Its officers are natives, untrained in the command and instruction of large bodies of men. The force is, and must be, so widely scattered that there is no chance for systematic and continued instruction in the use of firearms or even the rudiments of drill which must be used to meet a great emergency.

Under the circumstances, a state of discipline and efficiency can not be secured to make it possible for the officers to control their men and so direct their efforts as to make their service of proper effect if they had to be united in one organization for offensive or defensive purpose. Organized under political auspices, appointed by a political board, owing its existence to political support, it must always be an ally to the party in power.

The Government must always maintain an artillery force to garrison the fortifications, but under no circumstances could the men be withdrawn from the forts for the protection of property or life in the interior. The American business interests will always require and demand the presence of troops available for duty in case of trouble.

Mr. COWHERD I want simply to say——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the point of order?

Mr. COWHERD. I withdraw it, but wish to say just one word. It has seemed to me that if we were going into the question of holding these island possessions according to the English custom, we could do nothing better than raise armies according to that custom, from the natives, in order to instill some kind of loyalty into those people. But I do not pretend to put my knowledge of the situation down there against that of the Committee on Military Affairs, if they think this regiment unnecessary.

Mr. HULL. There is no objection to such a regiment being recruited as part of the Army, but to support this regiment there as has been done is an utterly uncalled-for expense to the Government. As soon as the Committee of the Whole resumes its session, after rising informally to receive a message from the Senate, I will offer an amendment which I think will meet the gentleman's views.

Mr. COWHERD, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HULL. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOUTELL reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16567) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and had come to no resolution thereon.

REBATE OF DUTY ON COAL.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 16649) to provide rebate of duties on coal in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that this amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We would like to have the amendment read, so that we may know what it is.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly; the Chair would not submit the amendment without its being read.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But I did not hear any request that it be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from New York. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to take up the amendment of the Senate to what is known as the "coal bill," for the purpose of moving concurrence in the amendment which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to House bill (H. R. 16649) to provide rebate of duties on coal. After line 7 insert:

"SEC. 2. That the provisions of paragraph 415 of the tariff act of July 24, 1897, shall not hereafter be construed to authorize the imposition of any duty upon anthracite coal."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to provide rebate of duties on coal, and for other purposes."

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER. As the Chair is advised, the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] was to take up this amendment and concur in it.

Mr. PAYNE. That was the request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I only want to say that I think the gentleman ought to have accorded to this side of the House the right to make that request. There is no objection on this side. [Renewed applause.]

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the amendment of the Senate is concurred in.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in was laid on the table.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. HULL, the House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. BOUTELL in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, in order to get it in the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk read, in my time, Exhibit B, to be found in the report of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to have read the statement which is sent to the Clerk's desk. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 2, 1903.

SIR: In my annual report of the operations of the War Department for the year of 1902 I remarked as follows concerning the organization known as the Porto Rico provisional regiment:

"PORTO RICO REGIMENT.

"The act of February 2, 1901, provides that the Porto Rico regiment shall be continued in service until further directed by Congress. I recommend that the discontinuance of that regiment be now directed, and that at the same time the right of enlistment in the Regular Army be extended to citizens of Porto Rico. There is no longer occasion for maintaining a special and peculiar force in the island at the expense of the United States outside of the coast-defense fortifications. Under the prosperous conditions which have followed the very liberal treatment of the island by the United States, the insular government is well able to support a police force adequate to preserve internal peace and order, and there is no more reason for maintaining a special United States force in addition to the Regular Army to protect Porto Rico against external attack than there is to maintain such a force to protect any part of our territory on the Atlantic coast. The people of Porto Rico should, however, have an opportunity to share in the general defense of the Government to which they owe allegiance and of the institutions which they enjoy."

I have now the honor to invite your attention to the foregoing remarks and recommendations, to which nothing can be added in the way of argument, and, as it is in the interest of economy, resulting in large saving, I request that provision for the discharge of this regiment be embodied in the appropriation bill now before Congress for the support of the Army for the year 1903-4, and be disposed of at this session of Congress.

In mustering out and disbanding the volunteer regiments organized for the war with Spain, leaves of absence for the officers and furloughs for the enlisted men were given by the Department for periods of one and two months, and Congress, in act of January 12, 1899, granted in lieu of leaves of absence and furloughs two months' extra pay to volunteer organizations thereafter mustered out of the service who served beyond the limits of the United States. I think a similar gratuity should be given to the Porto Rico regiment, and I so recommend.

Very respectfully,

ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
House of Representatives.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I send an amendment to the desk, which I will ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 2, page 17, insert the following:

"Provided further, That the Secretary of War is authorized to appoint officers of the said regiments to corresponding positions in the Regular Army, if, in his judgment, the public service requires."

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I would say, in addition to what was said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD], that I have received several letters from people living in Porto Rico questioning the wisdom of the measure abolishing the Porto Rican regiments; but, Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to oppose the judgment of the Secretary of War and of the Committee on Military Affairs. It seems, however, Mr. Chairman, that here are a number of officers who have served in the Porto Rican regiments who are not members of the Regular Army. If they are qualified officers, if they have given good service, why should not the Secretary of War be authorized—I do not ask that he be directed—but why should he not be authorized to use those officers for appointment in the Regular Army? That is the object of the amendment, and the only object.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is exceedingly bad legislation. I doubt very much, if the amendment is passed, if the Secretary of War would act under it in any case whatever.

Mr. PERKINS. He is not obliged to.

Mr. HULL. This is the proposition, as I understand the amendment as read from the desk: Here are men who have been taken from subordinate positions in the Regular Army to fill what were known when they accepted the places as high positions, as a temporary regiment. By this legislation we particularly say to the Secretary of War and to the people that we are in favor now of continuing these men in the higher offices that they have been filling, as permanent places in the Regular Army.

As a matter of fact, every captain in the Regular Army was willing and anxious to be the colonel of a provisional regiment, whoever may be the man that secured the position, and he secured it because, I suppose, he convinced the Secretary of War that he was the best man of his rank for that assignment. But every member of this committee will certainly recognize that it would be outrageously unfair to say to the Secretary of War that in the judgment of Congress these men might be appointed as colonels in the Regular Army in the permanent regiments, going over the heads of men of permanent rank in the line of the Army who may have served two or three times as long as they and be of higher rank than they.

There is a provision now of the general law that all these officers selected from the Regular Army for this temporary duty shall go back to their regular places in the line of the Army when this regiment shall be mustered out. They have had the advantage of additional rank, additional pay, and additional emolument by this service, something that was a favor to them, and now this amendment would say that Congress believes the favor should be made a permanent benefit. I can see where there is some reason in the gentleman's amendment, when applied to those officers who come in from civil life, if it were necessary to enable them to become second lieutenants. But it is not necessary.

Mr. PERKINS. That is what I said it applied to.

Mr. HULL. There are some of those; but under the present law they could be ordered up for examination, and hardly a month passes that opening would not be had for them to be appointed as second lieutenants in the regular establishment. They are eligible for that now. To provide higher rank for them would be unjust to every man now in the Regular Army.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, just a moment in reply. The object of my amendment was somewhat misunderstood, probably because I am not sufficiently familiar with the practice to draw it properly. I understood from the bill that the officers in the Porto Rican regiments who are now officers in the Regular Army would be returned to the service in the Regular Army. Such is the provision of the bill. I intended to cover the case, Mr. Chairman, as here suggested by my friend from Iowa, of the officers of the Porto Rican regiments who are not officers of the Regular Army at all, and for whom there is no provision in this bill.

It seems to me just, Mr. Chairman, that those who are not in the Regular Army, but who have served satisfactorily in the Porto Rican regiment, should be eligible to appointment in the Regular Army, and should not be thrown out of military service by reason of the disbandment of the Porto Rican regiment.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, that same thing applied to every one of our volunteer regiments, and applied with particular force to every one of our 30 provisional regiments that had actual service in the Philippines; and yet we made no such provision for them. They came in under the general law, and many of them have been appointed to lieutenancies in the Regular Army, as these men can be appointed to lieutenancies in the Regular Army.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, if there is no objection, I would ask to amend my amendment by striking out the word "corresponding," so that they shall be eligible to appointment in the Regular Army, but not to corresponding positions.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will make that amendment to the proposed amendment.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Is not that the law now?

Mr. PERKINS. If it is, it will do no harm.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. According to my understanding of the law as it is now, these officers of the provisional Porto Rican regiment who are natives of Porto Rico would not be eligible to appointment.

Mr. HULL. There are no natives who are officers, I think.

Mr. CAPRON. No; none but noncommissioned officers.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The commissioned officers are citizens of the United States.

Mr. HULL. All, I think, are citizens of the United States.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then I misapprehended the fact.

Mr. PERKINS. They are officers of the regiment, but not officers of the Regular Army.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And in addition to that, the privates in the Porto Rican regiment are not eligible to enlistment in the Regular Army.

Mr. HULL. The Secretary of War recommends that they be allowed to enlist in the Regular Army.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Since the gentleman has entered upon the field of legislation upon this subject, why did he not incorporate that provision in this bill?

Mr. HULL. The only reason was that it was a doubtful question as to whether any of the Porto Ricans would be willing to enlist to go out of the country; and there is a question in my mind whether it is not true, if they are a part of the citizenship of the United States, they can not now enlist in the Regular Army from the Territories here as well as from the States, whether they can not enlist as it is. The gentleman is a better lawyer than I am, and he can tell.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. According to the law as interpreted by the Supreme Court, if I understand the interpretation, they are not citizens of the United States, while the inhabitants of the Territories are, and therefore the inhabitants of the Territories are eligible to enlistment in the Regular Army. It seems to me that it would show some deference to these people and give them at least that privilege, even though it would never be exercised; and it occurs to me that the suggestion of the Secretary of War ought to have been embodied in this measure.

Mr. HULL. A proviso added to this, that natives of Porto Rico may be enlisted in the Regular Army, will cover that. I have no objection to it. We will have to dispose of the pending amendment first.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee what objection there is to a provision which should authorize the Secretary of War to take a citizen of this country who has been an officer of the Porto Rican regiment, but who is not an officer of the Regular Army, and appoint him an officer of the Regular Army?

Mr. HULL. I would say that unless it was limited to second lieutenants I should object to it, because it will throw the burden on the War Department and start a war on all of us to go there and get some man a good office. In my judgment it is bad legislation. Now, if you limit it to that, the Secretary of War has the same power now to appoint these men second lieutenants, if they can pass the examination, that he had to appoint the men who served during two years of actual hostilities in the Philippines who were volunteers of the provisional regiments. They were appointed by the President. They were in what were known as two-year regiments. These men went into regiments known to be temporary. Why should we turn around now and legislate specifically on that, when under the general law, if they can pass the examination these other officers have had to pass, they can be appointed?

Mr. PERKINS. We do not legislate specifically, but merely authorize the Secretary of War in his discretion, if in his judgment the public service will be promoted, to appoint them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HULL. I call for a vote.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of line 22, page 17, the following:

"Provided further, That citizens of the island of Porto Rico shall be eligible to enlistment in the Regular Army."

Mr. HULL. There is no objection to that that I know of.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Incidental expenses: Postage; cost of telegrams on official business received and sent by officers of the Army; extra pay to soldiers employed on extra duty, under the direction of the Quartermaster's Department, in the erection of barracks, quarters, and storehouses, in the construction of roads and other constant labor for periods of not less than ten days, and as clerks for post quartermasters at military posts, and for prison overseers at posts designated by the War Department for the confinement of general prisoners; for expenses of expresses to and from frontier posts and armies in the field, of escorts to paymasters and other disbursing officers, and to trains where military escorts can not be furnished; expenses of the interment of officers killed in action or who die when on duty in the field, or at military posts, or on the frontiers, or when traveling under orders, and of noncommissioned officers and soldiers; and in all cases where such expenses would have been lawful claims against the Government reimbursement may be made of expenses heretofore or hereafter incurred by individuals of burial and transportation of remains of officers, including acting assistant surgeons, not to exceed the amount now allowed in the cases of officers, and for the reimbursement in the cases of enlisted men not exceeding the amount now allowed in their cases, may be paid out of the proper funds appropriated by this act, and the disbursing officers shall be credited with such reimbursements heretofore made; but hereafter no reimbursement shall be made of such expenses incurred prior to the 21st day of April, 1898; authorized office furniture; hire of laborers in the Quartermaster's Department, including the hire of interpreters, spies, or guides for the Army; compensation of clerks and other employees to the officers of the Quartermaster's Department, and incidental expenses of recruiting; for the apprehension, securing, and delivering of deserters, including escaped military prisoners, and the expenses incident to their pursuit; and no greater sum than $50 for each deserter or escaped military prisoner shall, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be paid to any civil officer or citizen for such services and expenses; for a donation of $5 to each dishonorably discharged prisoner upon his release from confinement, under court-martial sentence, involving dishonorable discharge; for the following expenditures required for the several regiments of cavalry, the batteries of light artillery, and such companies of infantry and scouts as may be mounted, the authorized number of officers' horses, and for the trains, to wit: Hire of veterinary surgeons, purchase of medicines for horses and mules, picket ropes, blacksmith's tools and materials, horseshoes and blacksmith's tools for the cavalry service, and for the shoeing of horses and mules, and such additional expenditures as are necessary and authorized by law in the movements and operations of the Army, and at military posts, and not expressly assigned to any other department, $2,200,000.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of inquiring of the chairman of the committee as to what arrangements there are in this bill and what provision for the supplying of flagstaffs for the various fortifications of the Army where the same have been accidentally destroyed or destroyed by storm. In this connection I wish to say that the American flag is not flying from Fort Sumter. All the people of that vicinity rejoice to see that flag there now, and they ought to have an opportunity of seeing it, and the visitors to that fortification ought to have the same opportunity. That flagstaff has been destroyed by a cyclone and not replaced. It may be a sentimental matter, but there ought to be some provision for supplying deficiencies of that kind.

Mr. BARTLETT. It was accidental?

Mr. LACEY. Purely accidental.

Mr. HULL. It was purely accidental. It was destroyed by a storm. Flagstaffs at the different posts of the Army come under this appropriation, under the head of "incidentals." They can buy a new one any time it is called to the attention of the Department.

Mr. LACEY. I wish to call the attention of the Military Committee and the War Department to the fact; and while it is a matter of sentiment, it is one that all parts of the country rejoice in seeing given proper consideration at this time at that particular place.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee as to what is meant on page 23, line 18, by "spies," and how much of the appropriation could be used for the purpose of hiring spies, and whether the whole appropriation is to be used for that purpose?

Mr. HULL. No; it is one of the things for which appropriations have been made for forty years, and they are carried every year by the bill.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Carried every year by the bill?

Mr. HULL. Carried every year, and probably not one year in twenty any of it is used for that purpose.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Even in time of peace?

Mr. HULL. It is one of those provisions that have been in the bill for at least forty years, and it is carried along when there is no idea that any of them will be hired.

Mr. McCLELLAN. In time of peace?

Mr. HULL. At any time. If it should go out of the bill in time of war a point of order would be raised on the committee. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Barracks and quarters: For barracks and quarters for troops, storehouses for the safe-keeping of military stores, for offices, recruiting stations, and for the hire of buildings and grounds for summer cantonments, and for temporary buildings at frontier stations, for the construction of temporary buildings and stables, and for repairing public buildings at established posts, including the extra-duty pay of enlisted men employed on the same: Provided, That no part of the moneys so appropriated shall be paid for commutation of fuel or for quarters to officers or enlisted men: Provided further, That the number of and total sum paid for civilian employees in the Quartermaster's Department, including those paid from the funds appropriated for regular supplies, incidental expenses, barracks and quarters, Army transportation, clothing, camp and garrison equipage, shall be limited to the actual requirements of the service, and that no employee paid therefrom shall receive a salary of more than $150 per month, except upon the approval of the Secretary of War, $4,750,000; one-half of this amount to be immediately available.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on line 25, "one-half of this amount to be immediately available." It is in the nature of legislation first, and second it does not belong to a bill making provision for the service for the coming year. It is really for the service of the current year and belongs upon the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, as to the point of order I very much doubt whether it is well taken. It is a direction in regard to an appropriation that to my mind can hardly be considered as new legislation to the extent of being obnoxious to the rule. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that this was put in at the request of the Department in conversations after the hearings had been had. On page 59 of the hearings General Ludington, in answer to a question of the chairman as to why it should be made immediately available, says:

I will try to explain that, which I think I can do to your satisfaction. As it stands now, we can not begin any construction work until the 1st day of July, and in that way we lose some of the best building months, We lose April, May, and June of each year. We can not start in July and complete the buildings before the next year. It will save the Government money if contractors can have the advantage of all the best building months to do their work.

It does not increase the amount asked for upon the hearings; and in my judgment, at the time when they are making every effort possible in order to make enough buildings to completely furnish barracks and quarters for the enlarged army, and especially the Coast Artillery, if they can get the advantage of lettiny the contract when the bill becomes law and use part of the moneg in advance it will be a benefit to the Government in every way you may take it. Even if the point of order is good, I trust the gentleman will not insist upon it.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend I shall insist upon it. Purely and simply, it does not lie in the mouth of the Secretary of War or the Quartermaster-General to dictate by an examination to the House of Representatives how it shall conduct its business. Now, the rule of the House provides for the creation of the committees. The gentleman is familiar with it. It creates the military committee. Clause 3, Rule XI:

3. To appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government, as herein provided, viz: For legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for sundry civil expenses; for fortifications and coast defenses; for the District of Columbia; for pensions; and for all deficiencies—to the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, then, this item legitimately appears under the title of barracks and quarters in the first instance, beginning as the bill does with this appropriation, but it goes further, it increases the appropriation and it is for the current year $1,400,000. That is legitimate and the gentleman has, and his committee under the rules of the House have, the jurisdiction to report any amount that in the judgment of his committee should be so reported. But when it provides that one-half of this amount is to be immediately available it becomes in its very nature a deficiency appropriation. This bill provides for the expenses of the next year and provides over $2,000,000 for the current year for barracks and quarters, and it is a deficiency, so that this bill becomes at once a deficiency bill, as well as a bill to provide for the expenses of the coming fiscal year.

Now, then, if it be necessary for the service that an additional appropriation should be made for barracks and quarters over the present item until and including the 30th of June next, let the Secretary of War in a formal way, as the law directs, through the Secretary of the Treasury, send the estimate and receive its proper reference under the rules of the House. The committee that prepares the deficiency bill for the consideration of the House would have jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and all matters of deficiency then appear upon one bill, as the rule of the House contemplates. If we go into this method of appropriation, mixing together the coming fiscal year and the current year, you do not know where to look for anything if you want to get accurate information. Therefore, while it may be necessary that provision should be made for the current year for this service, about which I express no opinion at all until it shall have been examined, it can be seen at once, for the reasons assigned, that an orderly conduct of the business would dictate that the various rules of the House should be observed. Otherwise you have things mixed and in a condition that breeds confusion, if not disorder.

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. CAPRON. I would like to ask my friend if he considers it a deficiency when the plans and specifications have been prepared, and are pretty well completed, for barracks and quarters at the different coast-defense stations, as well as those for the troops returning from the foreign stations, and they have a certain amount appropriated for that purpose merely because they ask to be allowed to commence work on this in the month of May rather than to commence it on the 1st day of July? Is that a deficiency, or is it simply carrying out the work because the fiscal year does not adjust itself to the working year for this kind of construction?

Mr. CANNON. In reply to the gentleman from Rhode Island, I will say that a deficiency appropriation means, in the spirit of the rule, an additional appropriation for the current year. Now, the current year began on the 1st of July last and ends on the 30th of June next. Any appropriation for that service means a deficiency, if it is made during the current year. That is in the meaning of the rule. Now, then, the gentleman's statement whether it would be wise to begin on the 1st day of May or not is not important. I will say to him that it is quite in the power of the House, if the committee having jurisdiction to recommend a deficiency in the regular bill fails to do so, it is quite within the power of the House, on the motion of any member, to include the amount; and if the service requires this sum to be expended during the current year it can be done just as readily in a regular and orderly bill as it can be in this bill, and quite as soon. So there is no reason, from the standpoint of the public service, that I should withdraw the point of order, and there is every reason why I should insist on the point of order, so as to keep these bills separate, as the rule intended it should be.

Mr. HULL. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that neither the Secretary of War nor the Quartermaster-General undertook to dictate what we should do. The Quartermaster-General presented the reasons why they would like the words put in. The Secretary of War said nothing about it.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend will allow me, I find on inquiry that no estimate for deficiency for additional money for barracks or quarters has been submitted.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman had waited a minute, I was going to state that precise point. It is not a deficiency in any sense whatever, for the reason that no contract has been let for the work, and no attempt has been made to saddle on the Government a deficiency. They have gone within the appropriation made in the last bill, and the only object of these words was to enable them to let contracts a little sooner than they otherwise would. It does not increase the expense, and if it did, it would go to the gentleman's committee.

Mr. CANNON. Does it not provide money for the current year?

Mr. HULL. It provides that some of it may be used this fiscal year, and that has been done repeatedly in this House, with all due respect to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Never without a violation of the rules.

Mr. HULL. It may be that attention was not called to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule on the question.

Mr. HULL. Let the Chair rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill under consideration is the general annual Army appropriation bill for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1903, and ending June 30, 1904. The general appropriation for the present fiscal year of 1903 was made in the bill last year. It seems to the Chair that any expenditure for the Army during the current year must necessarily be considered as an expenditure to make up deficiencies in the Army appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1903, or the current year. Any bill, therefore, whether this bill or any other measure providing for the appropriation of the sums so used, must be considered as a deficiency bill, and the appropriation itself, whether made in this measure or in a measure with another title, would be an appropriation to make good a deficiency—an amount not provided for in the Army appropriation bill for the current fiscal year. Being a deficiency appropriation, it should be included in a deficiency bill; and under clause 3 of Rule XI the deficiency bill would be a bill referred to and coming from the Committee on Appropriations. As it seems to the Chair that this is to make good a deficiency, the Chair is constrained to sustain the point of order.

Mr. HULL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 24, page 25, insert the following:

"Provided further, That the sum of $6,000 of this appropriation, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be used for the payment of any assessment against the property of the United States arsenal at Indianapolis, Ind., and the cost of appraisement of said reservation in connection with its sale."

Mr. CANNON. I feel constrained to make a point of order against this amendment.

Mr. HULL. I hope the gentleman will simply reserve the point. This is not from the committee.

Mr. CANNON. I will do so out of respect to my friend's request; but I will say to him that there is a whole troop—yes, more, a division—of similar claims running against almost every public building and reservation in the country.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I fully understand that there are a large number of claims against the Government of the United States for special assessments in cities—running more especially against cities having post-office buildings, where expenses have been incurred without securing appropriations in advance of incurring the expense. This, however, is a little different from the others in this: In the last Congress we passed a bill providing for the sale of this ground in the city of Indianapolis, and that the money should be paid into the Treasury, and at the same time located a post near the city. The Secretary of War, in selling the ground, finds this special assessment standing against the property. This charge would not have any effect as against the Government of the United States; but it is such a cloud upon the title that a private individual would not desire to purchase this land unless this charge could be waived or obviated. If there is no objection on the part of the gentleman from Illinois, I will ask to have read a letter from the Assistant Secretary of War covering this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 8, 1903.

SIR: In carrying into execution the clause of the current act of appropriation for the support of the Army (act of June 30, 1902, 32 Stats., 507, 515), which authorizes the sale of the military reservations at Indianapolis, Ind., Columbus, Ohio, and Buffalo, N. Y., I find that there is a sewer assessment outstanding against the arsenal property at Indianapolis. The amount of the assessment is $4,712.56; and the expense was incurred, with the approval of the Department, in order to furnish a sewer connection for the barracks and quarters for the troops constituting the garrison. There will also be some expense in connection with the appraisement of the Indianapolis reservation, which was provided for, in connection with its sale, in the current appropriation bill.

With a view to cancel these outstanding obligations and to give a clear title to the property, it is suggested that the cost of the sewer construction and the expenses of appraisement be authorized to be paid from the sum realized from the sale of the lands and improvements constituting the military reservation at Indianapolis, Ind.; and I remain,

Very respectfully,

WM. CARY SANGER,
Acting Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
House of Representatives.

Mr. HULL. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET].

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, as stated by the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, Congress has already, by law, authorized the sale of what is called the military reservation or arsenal at Indianapolis, Ind. Under the law giving this authority the Secretary of War was directed to sell the property for not less than the appraised value, and to make the ordinary deed of transfer. Under that authority he has, through proper channels, organized a board of appraisers, which has fixed an appraised value upon the property.

A scheme of sale is now under consideration by the Department, and I have no hesitancy in saying that in all probability within the next forty-five days the sale will be consummated, as parties stand ready to make the purchase. Unless Congress by some provision similar to that now under consideration shall authorize the payment of the expenses of the board of appraisers, they will not receive any compensation. That is a small matter, and they, of course, raise no criticism as to that. The item of expense, $4,712.56, is for the expense of a sewer constructed for the purpose of benefiting this identical property. The work was performed in the proper legal way under the laws of that State, and is necessarily a benefit to the property. It is therefore a charge against it in proportion to the amount as assessed.

The law under which this sale will be made provides specifically that the sum for which the property shall be sold shall be paid into the General Treasury. All that this amendment does is to provide that the General Treasury shall discharge that obligation. It is true there may be other similar charges, but the Government will be embarrassed in the sale of this property unless some provision shall be made to discharge this obligation.

In my judgment, the property will sell for more than the appraisement; but if sold for less than the appraisement, there would be no provision for the discharge of this obligation, and the purchaser would be compelled to pay it. Gentlemen will remember that while the Government is relieved from this charge, yet when the title passes from the Government to the individual purchaser this assessment becomes a charge against him. There is nothing but equity in this provision. It may be subject to the point of order, but the Government aims to deal fairly. If the property were not about to be sold, to pass into private hands—if the Government were not making provision immediately for this sale—then I would think the point of order ought properly to be made and acted upon in favor of the Government.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand that this is a debt, if it is a debt at all, due to the city of Indianapolis for a matter of improvement to the streets or the building of a sewer.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is not in favor of the city. It is in favor of the contractor who put in the sewer.

Mr. BARTLETT. But the contractor did it at the instance of the city?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is done under the law of the city and for the interests of this property and other property adjacent to it desiring and needing sewer connection.

Mr. BARTLETT. The same kind of debt would exist in case of assessment for pavement in front of property.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Except, I think, all parties agree that sewer improvements are even more important improvements than sidewalks.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is under the same sort of law.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, unquestionably.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman take the position that the United States Government or its property is liable as an adjacent landowner when improvements of that sort are made?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, it is not liable under the law. Congress must authorize it.

Mr. BARTLETT. The reason which leads me to ask the question is this, that such improvements of that kind were made in my city, adjacent to property owned by the Government, and the Government, I think properly, took the position that it was not liable to pay its portion under that sort of law.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The peculiar justice in adopting this amendment lies in the fact that the Government has obtained authority to sell this property and have the money covered into the Treasury, and if it shall be sold then this charge will rest against the owner of the property when the transfer shall be made. I realize in all probability that it is subject to the point of order. I think under the circumstances, and the recommendation of the War Department showing that it is to be paid out of money which is yet to be paid for the property, that Congress can well afford to let the amendment pass.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I would like to ask my colleague a question. Has it not been the uniform policy of the Government to pay its equitable and pro rata share for street and sewer improvements in cities?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I so understand, but such payments are always made under direct authority of Congress.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Of course; they have to be.

Mr. OVERSTREET. But the practice is just as the gentleman has stated.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand it to be so.

Mr. MANN. Is it not possible to sell this property subject to this claim?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not so understand from the War Department's construction of the law under which they are going to sell.

Mr. MANN. But the statement of the gentleman is that this is not a claim against the property as it now stands, but that it will be a claim against the property when it goes into the hands of a private owner.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not quite that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman what the position is then in reference to that?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is a claim against the Government for that improvement, and if the regular channel were pursued, a special bill would necessarily be introduced in the House and the matter referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAY. Has the gentleman from Illinois withdrawn his point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has reserved his point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to make just one statement, if my colleague will allow me. Property of the Government is not subject to local taxation, or taxation by the State. This was not. If any assessments were levied, they were absolutely void, and are now, and are no lien whatever upon the property. For at least a quarter of a century, certainly twenty years, the practice has been that the Government has not appropriated for the payment of taxes to the municipality or the State. In my own town they went through the form of levying this same kind of a tax. Finally the city council appropriated the money to pay it, but this is a small matter of itself, and I know that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], when I state it, will realize that I do not single this out to make the point of order upon it. The fact is, however, that there are hundreds of claims which gentlemen present to the Committee on Appropriations saying that there is substantial equity in them. The practice of Congress, however, has been the other way, and I am compelled to insist upon the point of order. If it is the sense of Congress now to have another policy, why, that is all right.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman does not want to be understood as saying there are hundreds of claims where the property is about to be sold?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, that does not make any difference. It is absolutely void. Any assessment is void. It is no cloud upon title, I submit to the gentleman. However, I do not know that I ought to say that, because I am not as good a lawyer as my friend. But let that be as it may, the fact that the Government sells makes no difference. It is the same thing in principle, and I do it a little for peace on the part of the Committee on Appropriations, because if this goes, all ought to go.

Mr. OVERSTREET. All similarly situated?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois renew the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. I can not withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 25, line 24, after the word "dollars," add the following: Provided, That of the above amount the sum of $9,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be used by the Secretary of War to purchase additional ground adjacent to the present Omaha quartermaster's depot reservation in Omaha, Nebr., for the purpose of enlarging said reservation to admit the erection thereon of the quartermaster's warehouse building.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation of the Army and its supplies: Transportation of the Army, including baggage of the troops when moving either by land or water, and including also the transportation of recruits and recruiting parties heretofore paid from the appropriation for "Expenses of recruiting;" of supplies to the militia furnished by the War Department; of the necessary agents and employees; of clothing, camp and garrison equipage, and other quartermaster stores, from Army depots or places of purchase or delivery to the several posts and Army depots, and from those depots to the troops in the field; of horse equipments and subsistence stores from the places of purchase, and from the places of delivery under contract to such places as the circumstances of the service may require them to be sent; of ordnance, ordnance stores, and small arms from the foundries and armories to the arsenals, fortifications, frontier posts, and Army depots; freights, wharfage, tolls, and ferriages; the purchase and hire of draft and pack animals and harness, and the purchase and repair of wagons, carts, and drays, and of ships and other vessels and boats required for the transportation of troops and supplies and for garrison purposes; for drayage and cartage at the several posts; hire of teamsters and other employees; extra-duty pay of enlisted men driving teams, repairing means of transportation, and employed as train masters, and in opening roads and building wharves; transportation of funds of the Army; the expenses of sailing public transports on the various rivers, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic and Pacific oceans; for procuring water, and introducing the same to buildings at such posts as from their situation require it to be brought from a distance, and for the disposal of sewage and drainage, and for constructing roads and wharves; for the payment of Army transportation lawfully due such land-grant railroads as have not received aid in Government bonds (to be adjusted in accordance with the decisions of the Supreme Court in cases decided under such land-grant acts), but in no case shall more than 50 per cent of full amount of service be paid: Provided, That such compensation shall be computed upon the basis of the tariff or lower special rates for like transportation performed for the public at large, and shall be accepted as in full for all demands for such service: Provided further, That in expending the money appropriated by this act a railroad company which has not received aid in bonds of the United States, and which obtained a grant of public land to aid in the construction of its railroad on condition that such railroad should be a post route and military road, subject to the use of the United States for postal, military, naval, and other Government services, and also subject to such regulations as Congress may impose restricting the charge for such Government transportation, having claims against the United States for transportation of troops and munitions of war and military supplies and property over such aided railroads, shall be paid out of the moneys appropriated by the foregoing provision only on the basis of such rate for the transportation of such troops and munitions of war and military supplies and property as the Secretary of War shall deem just and reasonable under the foregoing provision, such rate not to exceed 50 per cent of the compensation for such Government transportation as shall at that time be charged to and paid by private parties to any such company for like and similar transportation; and the amount so fixed to be paid shall be accepted as in full for all demands for such service: Provided further, That the number of draft animals purchased from this appropriation, added to those now on hand, shall be limited to such numbers as are actually required for the service, $15,000,000.

Mr. HAY. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to reserve a point of order on all contained between line 14, page 27, and line 20, page 28.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York reserves the point of order against the paragraph mentioned. Does the gentleman from Iowa wish to discuss it?

Mr. HULL. Oh, not at all. There is nothing in it.

Mr. HAY. What is the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The point of order is that it is new legislation.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, it has been enacted every year for a great many years; I do not know how many years back. If the gentleman will compare it, he will find that it is line for line with a provision that has been carried in the appropriation bill for a very long time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserved the point of order for the purpose of getting an explanation of it.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman will find that there has not been a change of a word in this provision in years. I ask for a decision on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York renew the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserved it only for the purpose of being informed about the provision.

Mr. HULL. It is so clearly in order that I did not propose to discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York withdraws the point of order.

Mr. HAY. I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 23, page 28, add the following proviso:

"Provided, That no action looking to the discontinuance of the transport service shall be taken without further action of Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report."

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "oceans," in line 11, page 27, insert the following:
"No steamship in the transport service of the United States shall be sold or disposed of without the consent of Congress having been first had and obtained."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that is subject to a point of order.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have no doubt that it is; but in view of the speech that the gentleman made on yesterday, which was a most elaborate demonstration of the usefulness of these transports, and in view of the fact that the sales that have been made heretofore have been made for very small sums of money, it seems to me that there ought to be unanimity on the part of the members of the House in sustaining that service.

Mr. HULL. Let me ask the gentleman if he does not think the amendment already passed is sufficient?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; it is not. That applies to the discontinuance of the transport service.

Mr. HULL. I shall make no point upon it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to call the gentleman's attention to this point.

Mr. HULL. Go ahead. I have not made any point at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question, then, is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clothing, and camp and garrison equipage: For cloth, woolens, materials, and for the manufacture of clothing for the Army, for issue and for sale at cost price, according to the Army Regulations; for altering and fitting clothing and washing and cleaning, when necessary; for equipage, and for expenses of packing and handling, and similar necessaries; for a suit of citizen's outer clothing, to cost not exceeding $10, to be issued upon release from confinement to each prisoner who has been confined under a court-martial sentence involving dishonorable discharge; for indemnity to officers and men of the Army for clothing and bedding, etc., destroyed since April 22, 1898, by order of medical officers of the Army for sanitary reasons, $4,000,000.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. HULL. What paragraph was it?

Mr. HAY. I just want to do it so we may adjourn.

Mr. HULL. I hope the gentleman will not raise the question of no quorum at this time. It has been the general understanding that we would go on for a few minutes longer before the House adjourns.

Mr. HAY. At what hour?

Mr. HULL. It will not be more than ten minutes, and we will be that much further along with the bill. Now, I hope the gentleman will not insist on his point. We can not adjourn in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAY. We can find out whether we can adjourn.

Mr. HULL. If we read a couple of more pages there will be no further trouble.

Mr. HAY. There is no trouble now.

The Clerk read as follows:

Construction and repair of hospitals: For construction and repair of hospitals at military posts already established and occupied, including the extra-duty pay of enlisted men employed on the same, and including also all expenditures for construction and repairs required at the Army and Navy Hospital at Hot Springs, Ark., except quarters for the officers and for the construction and repair of general hospitals and expenses incident thereto, and for additions needed to meet the requirements of increased garrisons, $475,000: Provided, That $60,000 of this amount may be used for the construction at Vancouver Barracks, Wash., of a modern hospital for 48 beds, necessary to accommodate the sick of the contemplated increase of the garrison at that post to one regiment of infantry and two light batteries of artillery.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to ask the gentleman not to dispose of this paragraph.

Mr. HULL. I am willing to pass that over until to-morrow.

Mr. HAY. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia objects.

Mr. HULL. Well, Mr. Chairman, it seems that the disposition of the House is so overwhelmingly in favor of quitting that I will move that the committee do now rise, although the agreement was that we should run until half past 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOUTELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16567 and had come to no resolution thereon.
